Student activities center referendum fails

"At this time, we don't exactly have office space — we use the Women's Center for meetings. The 24-hour access of the SAC would definitely benefit us. It would be easier to network with various groups if we were located in the same place."
— Sarah Bailey, president of Queer/Straight Alliance

"I feel that enough money is available that students shouldn't be obligated to pay for it. I don't feel it is necessary because the Union facilities are more than adequate right now, and help needs to be given more to the library and teachers' salaries."
— Peter Pazauskie, senior in chemistry and chemical engineering

More than 80 percent of 2,465 students voted not to help fund a $4.8 million student activities center.

The student-wide referendum took place from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. Thursday. The center would have raised student privilege fees by $6.50 per semester for the next 15 years.

Student Senate Chair Travis Lenkner said it was hard to educate 22,000 people about the proposed center. He said the fee increase influenced student votes.

Sixty-percent approval from the student body was required for the referendum to pass.

"It's hard to vote yes — it's easy to vote no," he said. "Anytime you put 60 percent there, the odds are stacked."

Student Body President Jake Worchester said the activities center concept will not perish with his term. He said the proposal might be addressed within the next two years.

"I think there is support for the concept," he said. "We're not going to have one by fall 2003."

An increase in student fees and tuition this semester discouraged some students from endorsing the center, Worchester said. He said students preferred that their money be used differently.

Additional funding for the center would have come from a $750,000 surplus in the privilege fee reserves account. Excess university revenues generated from increased enrollment also would have contributed.

The building would have been constructed on the K-State Student Union's east side. It would have included 120 cubicle spaces for student groups. Four cornerstone organizations would have received office space. The 16,525-square-foot space would also have included copiers, computers, fax machines and other office equipment. Professional advising, conference rooms, a secretarial staff, work rooms and storage space was also proposed.

Worchester said significant ramifications will not result from the vote. "We do a good job with student activities here," he said. "It's hard to show people what they're missing when they don't know what they're missing."

Chris Nord, sophomore in political science, votes against the student activity center proposal Thursday afternoon in the K-State Student Union. Nord was part of the 81.05 percent opposing the new activity center, out of 2,465 voters.

Gore uncertain of future

By NICK BRATKOVIC

NASHVILLE — The wind swirled outside the Nashville International Airport as Vice President Al Gore exited the city Thursday.

Gore left his home state with dreams of a future presidency still alive. He left after spending the last day inside the Loew's Hotel in Nashville. And he left uncertain of his future.

He boarded the airplane trailing in by a count of 2,909,661 votes to 2,907,877 or 1,774 votes, in the 53 counties that were officially finished with the Florida recount.

The recount process could continue until Nov. 17, when all unrecalled votes are counted, Katherine Harris, Florida secretary of state, said.

"We will continue to conduct this process with all due speed, but to ensure accuracy in the process," she said.

Electoral College, Florida recount brings about protests

AUSTIN — Protesters marched up and down the sidewalk in front of the Governor's Mansion in Texas on Thursday evening.

Signs that said, "Bush equals disgrace," "Florida has fuzzy math" and "No president by mistake," reflected the attitudes of those outside the mansion.

Robin Schneider, holding a sign that said, "Let the people decide," led a group of around 40 protesters in the chant, "What do we want? A revote. When do we want it? Now."

"We are telling Bush and Vice President Gore to hold their horses," she said. "It's premature to act as president."

While both of them needed to wait, she said the candidates were handling the situation differently.

"I think that Gore has been much more measured in his response. Bush has really overstepped the bounds somewhere, and we want to make sure it doesn't go any further," she said.

She said her group of protesters didn't want anyone to rush judgment, and that a revote in Florida should be done. She sympathized with the residents in Palm Beach, Fla., who said they had misleading voter ballots.

If she was a resident in Palm Beach County and had not voted for the candidate she wanted because of a confusing ballot, she would want a revote, Schneider said.

"I'd be furious," she said. "I'm furious anyway. Our democracy has to be respected no matter what."

Schneider said she felt the American people were concerned about what was occurring in Florida.

"What is the election law? Has it been violated?" she said. "We need to make sure the president that takes a seat in the White House is truly the will of the people."

While Schneider protested to say slow down, Wilson Leary, East Austin resident, protested for a different reason.

"I want people to question the results of the election," he said. "I want there to be a federal investigation in Florida."

He said the results of the election did not surprise him. He expected it to be close — especially in Florida.

"I am worried some of George Sr.'s CIA connections might be controlling the votes there," he said.

Leary, holding a sign that said, "Votergate," said he hoped the American people would fight for democracy.

"Just this one word will get the message out," he said. "Votergate says it all."

One Bush supporter yelled "Bush" in Leary's direction.

Leary responded by saying, "Well, I

American Indian month begins

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

November is Native American Heritage Month, which, especially for the Kansas prairie, sparks curiosity as to what life was like hundreds of years ago.

The American Indians once traveled, hunted and survived on the land that now contains homes and shopping malls.

"It is quite bizarre to contemplate that this town prides itself in having a major university within its confines, but there is nothing that reminds the public of the people who founded the land," Harald Prins, professor of anthropology, said.

Located where the Blue River runs into the Kansas River, here in Manhattan, the Kaw Indians settled and began growing crops and hunting years ago. Over time, the Americans took over and gave them no choice but to surrender.

"It is indignity how these people were treated when our state name of Kansas comes from the Kanza Indians," Prins said.

Manhattan High School identifies itself with the proud name of the "Manhattan Indians," a generic "Indian" mascot, yet there still is no recognition given to the full-blooded Kaw Indian elder named Little Star who died at the age of 82 last spring and was left unnoticed, he said.

"Connecting the prehistoric past with the present, we have found that in the town of Manhattan there is a large amount of Native American history and sites that are extremely significant," said Donna Roper, research associate professor and archaeologist.

The purpose of Native American Heritage Month is a time to respect the few authentic histories of the region's indigenous peoples.

"Being a full-blooded Navajo, I find it unique to share aspects of my culture with others who are interested," said LaVerne Bitsie-Baldwin, graduate student in mathematics.

Athletic events allow fans to give to needy through Cats for Cans

By DALAENA NEFF
Kansas State Collegian

Filling Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets for the needy has been the objective for six years with the Cats for Cans program.

"Cats for Cans is a university-wide food and fund drive. The nucleus of it comes from the engineering department," said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

Cans will be collected at the K-State vs. Nebraska football game this weekend, as well as the basketball games. These collections will be used for the Thanksgiving and Christmas baskets that will be distributed to more than 1,800 families in Manhattan, Bramhall said.

"Cats for Cans is vital to the Thanksgiving baskets. Over 150,000 pounds of food and $20,000 in funds were raised last year," she said. "People think what they give is small, but it has made a huge difference. Every donation is a big donation."

On the Sunday before Thanksgiving and Christmas, volunteers gather at the Breadbasket to make the holiday baskets.

"Each family will receive a food basket with the makings of a holiday meal, and a little more," Bramhall said.

The baskets are made according to the size of the family, she said. They include either a turkey or ham, which the cash donations are used to buy; fresh potatoes; cranberry sauce; canned fruit; cake mixes and much more, she said.

Families in need of a holiday basket or another project called Adopt-a-Family, which provides Christmas presents to the children whose parents cannot afford to buy presents, can sign up at the Breadbasket, Bramhall said. The Breadbasket has a variety of morning and evening hours available.

Last Christmas reached an all-time high of 2,000 families, Bramhall said.

"That was an all-time high," she said. "Riley County has a 21.2-percent poverty rate."

People try to blame the poverty rate on the university and Fort Riley, Bramhall said.

"It doesn't matter if you are the university or Fort Riley," she said. "If you are hungry, you are hungry."

Abby Seim, junior in architectural engineering, and Bryan Catterson, junior in construction science, are the student coordinators for Cats for Cans.

"They are responsible to get the word out that Cats for Cans is happening, and they do a great job," Bramhall said.

Seim said they try to organize all the student groups and help brainstorm new ideas. Many greek houses, residence halls, K-State athletics and other groups are involved, Seim said.

"We are still getting calls right now for

DNA tests confirm paternity of daughter of slain woman

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — DNA tests have confirmed that Carl Stasi fathered the child born to a woman who disappeared 15 years ago and is one of the six people John E. Robinson Sr. is accused of killing.

Stasi complains about being denied access to the girl, born Tiffany Stasi but raised as Heather Robinson by the brother and sister-in-law of the man accused of killing her mother.

"The only thing I can assume is that they are trying to stall and delay all they can," said Seth Shumaker, Carl Stasi's attorney from Kirksville, Mo.

Carl Stasi and Lisa Elledge were dating, although not exclusively, in late 1983 and early 1984. They married in August 1984 when he was 24 and she was 19 and eight months pregnant. On Sept. 3, 1984, Lisa Stasi gave birth to Tiffany, with Carl listed as the father on her birth certificate.

By the end of that year the marriage was dissolving, and Carl left the Kansas City area to re-enlist in the Navy. Lisa and her daughter were staying at a battered women's shelter when, by several accounts, John Robinson approached the young mother.

Robinson, say Carl's relatives and investigators who looked into the case at the time, offered her free lodging and job training. Lisa and Tiffany were last seen, with Robinson, by friends and relatives Jan. 9, 1985.

Last summer, Robinson was charged with murdering six women, including Lisa Stasi, over several years. The bodies of the other five victims were found in barrels, but Lisa Stasi's body has never been found.

New cancer medication passes safety tests, shows promise

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — Eagerly awaited test results on a much-publicized new cancer drug designed to stop tumors by cutting off their blood supply indicate the medication is safe and show promising signs it might help control the disease.

However, the results released Thursday suggest the drug endostatin is unlikely to be the kind of across-the-board cancer cure many had hoped for.

The drug was tested on terminally ill cancer patients largely to assess its safety.

No dramatic recoveries have so far been seen among the 61 patients studied.

"Some patients benefited, but many did not," said one of the chief investigators, Dr. Roy Herbst, an assistant professor of medicine at the M.D. Anderson Cancer Center in Houston. "These patients were very sick. Most of their tumors are going to grow no matter what you do."

Despite the lack of cures, the testing provided some evidence the drug might cut off a tumor's blood supply, as intended, offering hope the approach could work better in patients who are less desperately ill.

Blood flow through the tumors became less robust and chemicals involved in blood vessel creation diminished as patients were given increasingly higher doses of endostatin.

No serious side effects were noticed in any of the patients, the scientists said.

The recent discovery that angiogenesis, or the creation of new blood vessels, is vital to a tumor's survival has been the basis for the hottest area in cancer research.

Drugs that attack the process are called angiogenesis inhibitors. Endostatin is one of dozens of such drugs, which are at varying stages of development and attack blood vessel growth from different angles.

Some experts predict endostatin and the other drugs will in most cases halt cancer growth, turning the disease from an acute fatal illness into a low-level ongoing condition, like diabetes or arthritis.

Electoral College could see change

■ Electoral, popular vote split could lead to future examination of system.

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

It happened in 1824, 1876, 1888 and could again happen in 2000.

The United States is facing a split between electoral and popular votes.

Of the country's 538 total electoral votes, 270 are needed to win the presidency. If the votes end up splitting, that could give people incentive to seek change.

Jonas Stewart, senior in political science, said he thinks the Electoral College system is outdated.

Originally, the framers of the Constitution enacted the electoral system because they wanted to regulate the number of candidates in the elections and because it was hard to tabulate all the votes, Stewart said.

Stewart said he hopes this election will bring about some needed changes to the Electoral College system.

"I hope the election will bring a revolution of sorts to get rid of the Electoral College," he said. "The ambiguity in this election is a result of the Electoral College."

Clay Greeson, graduate student in kinesiology, said he thinks the country should do away with the electoral vote because it makes the system too complex, and the results of the election should instead be based on the popular vote.

Still, Greeson said he thinks this has been a good learning experience for Americans.

"I think it is cool something like this is going on," he said. "You don't see this kind of thing everyday."

Another possibility is members of the Electoral College might vote for someone who did not win the popular vote.

In 48 of the states, the winner of the popular vote is supposed to take all the electoral votes, as well. These votes are counted on Jan. 6 by the Congress.

This is where the process can get complicated, said Jim Franke, associate professor of political science. Sometimes there are some electorates who are called faithless electors — they vote for someone other than the person who received the majority. In a few states, there are reprimands for the faithless electors. "The electorates are supposed to vote in a particular way," Franke said.

The possibility exists that these voters might not vote as they are expected to and could change the predicted outcome, Franke said. Regardless if the electoral voters vote for the majority winner of their state or not, the electoral votes are the deciding factor in who the next president will be.

"Things could totally flip-flop," Greeson said. "It will be interesting to predict who wins today, then have the overall electoral vote be totally different."

voted for Nixon, too."

The supporter, Phillip Koenig, a student from San Antonio, said protesting for a revote was a waste of the protesters' time.

"It's unconstitutional, first of all, to have a revote," he said. "It would mean Florida would pretty much have a hand on who's the next president, and that's wrong."

The idea of a revote, he said, was something the Democrats needed to forget about.

"They just can't accept their losses, pretty much," Koenig said.

Koenig said he drove to Austin on Tuesday to support Bush at the election party, and didn't plan to leave until everything was straightened out.

"We're standing strong," he said.

Paula Anderson, a senior at Vanderbilt University, protests against the Electoral College. She and a group of friends demanded that the electors respect and uphold the will of the people as expressed in the popular vote of the president of the United States. The protest occurred Thursday outside the Legislative Plaza at Broadway and 9th streets in Nashville.

Republicans criticize handling of election

■ Bush camp condemns Democratic Party actions.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

AUSTIN — Members of Gov. George W. Bush's campaign criticized the way the Democratic Party was handling the election in a press conference Thursday afternoon.

"By democratic process, all of our votes are on Election Day. It does not call for us to continue voting until someone likes the outcome," Don Evans, campaign chairman, said.

Evans said Vice President Al Gore's campaign did not like the outcome on Election Day and speculated they wouldn't like the official recount results, either.

He also said Gore's campaign wasn't telling the whole truth in Florida. The ballots in Palm Beach, Fla., had been verified to use, and that, in fact, the person who led the verification committee was a Democrat.

"The Democrats politicizing the majority of these events risk doing so at the expense of our democracy," Evans said.

As for discrepancy in voting numbers, Evan said the important thing to stay focused on was the Florida recount.

Karen Hughes, campaign communications director, said she thought people should look at the way each party was approaching the situation.

It was troubling, she said, that Gore campaign chairman William Daley was supplying information without all of the facts.

Karl Rove, chief strategist, said the number of voters registered to third parties had increased by 110 percent in Palm Beach County, especially the Reform Party. Those registered to the Reform Party would most likely vote for their candidate, Pat Buchanan. That, he said, would explain the percentage of votes for Buchanan in that area, and that they weren't all meant for Gore.

Other states besides Florida might be performing a recount, as well, because of the close voter numbers, he said. These states include Wisconsin, Iowa and New Mexico.

In regard to waiting for the overseas ballots to be accounted for, Rove said he was optimistic because he said most overseas ballots tend to be Republican.

Campaign officials also discussed the fact that polls in St. Louis were kept open later. This area, they said, tended to be Democratic.

"It does affect the outcome of the election," Rove said.

The final recount in Florida was completed, but with the voting numbers so close, the process will continue.

GORE

officials after being deemed invalid are causing concern among the Democratic Party and voters. Some of those ballots were double-punched, Gore campaign officials said.

The vice president did not speak as he boarded his plane, but people in Nashville were taking to the streets speaking out. A pro-Gore rally took place on Broadway Street by a group looking to abolish the Electoral College.

"I think that they should abolish the Electoral College and let the people decide," said Kerri Roepk, a protesting Vanderbilt University student. "It is not democratic."

Roepk also said the ballots that were thrown out should be tabulated.

Another protester and Nashville resident, Mitch Chupora, said abolishing the Electoral College would make the situation in the country irrelevant.

"Either way, no matter who wins, they should abolish the Electoral College," Chupora said.

Protesters said having Gore in town brought Nashville to life.

"It's wonderful to have this political energy in the state of Tennessee," Chupora said. "I don't think not having a president hurts the country. I think it perhaps makes the country more politically aware."

Democrats weren't the only people present, as some of the protesters had originally backed Ralph Nader. Jonathan Farley, a professor at Vanderbilt University, said he voted for Nader, and doesn't agree with Gore supporters who blame Nader for the election's results.

"Other people might say that Al Gore had several months to court the Nader vote and didn't do so," Farley said. "He did not do that — in fact he said up until the last couple weeks of the campaign that he wouldn't."

Students should participate in Cats for Cans at games

Last holiday season, Riley County had a 21.2 percent poverty rate. There is something students can do to help: participate in Cats for Cans. This program has had a goal for six years: to raise items for those less fortunate during the holiday season.

It is a university-wide food and fund drive that originated in the College of Engineering. Cans will be collected at the K-State vs. Nebraska game tomorrow, as well as at the basketball games.

Once collected, they will be used to fill holiday baskets at the Flint Hills Breadbasket, which will benefit more than 1,800 families in the Little Apple.

Last year, over 150,000 pounds of food and $20,000 were raised.

Every little bit helps. This is especially true when the final production of the baskets comes together. The baskets are made according to the size of the family.

Another project Adopt-a-Family, provides Christmas presents for children whose parents can't afford to buy gifts. Participants can sign up at the Breadbasket.

These are two wonderful programs that have the common goal of trying to make a difference in the lives of those around them.

Remember to bring your cans of food or your donations, to the game tomorrow and to the basketball games.

Together we can make a difference.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

It really bothers me that three-fourths of the classes are closed, yet only one-quarter of the campus population has enrolled.

Tuition? $1,500. Rent? $300. Lunch at the Union? $5. Seeing a girl's bright purple underwear slip out of her pant leg on campus? Priceless.

Hmmm. Al Gore is only down by 10 electoral votes. It's funny how Tennessee, his home state, is worth 11.

I say we increase student fees by $6.50, collect the money and give it to the Manhattan homeless shelter.

Come on, they televised the Kansas/Nebraska game. Kansas. KU. KU football. Geez.

With all that ballot confusion in Florida, I am starting to wonder if I didn't accidentally write somebody in.

I am getting kind of sick of these fake interview columns on the sports section that don't actually give us any information nor actually show us an opinion.

If you're not smart enough to follow an arrow to vote, your vote shouldn't count.

I think we should take the $750,000 and buy some new teachers so we can actually get into some classes this semester.

I went to the Student Union today to vote on the student referendum, but I think I voted for Pat Buchanan.

Why won't Gore just accept the fact that he lost and quit whining?

Lie, cheat, steal or sue. What will Al Gore do to be President?

Seeking peace

Counseling should be source of strength, not something to be feared

Consider post traumatic stress disorder. On a light note, the name sounds like something that could follow a calculus test.

Perhaps this is what some fast food employees experience after a football team arrives at their place of business demanding food.

However, it is not something to be taken lightly.

At least 20 million Americans have experienced some form of PTSD.

You can make that number 20 million and one.

Last week, I was diagnosed with this disorder.

I was diagnosed because of a previous abusive, controlling relationship.

Recently, I decided to seek professional help in fully recovering from this experience. This has proven to be beneficial in terms of moving on from the past to a much healthier present.

Part of the reason I have been in so much "emotional pain" is because I have been reluctant to seek help from a therapist. Our society often makes it sound as if everyone who seeks counseling is a lunatic who deserves to be in a padded cell.

This is further from the truth than anything else.

As I sat in the chair in the University Counseling Services office, I was debating whether I really needed to talk with a therapist. A thousand excuses for why I should leave ran through my mind.

An hour later, after talking with my therapist, I felt relieved because for the first time, I was able to talk with someone about my experiences, about my pain.

Candidly, I told her about how I tried to forget the past, but I couldn't. And for the first time I didn't act like everything was OK, because it wasn't. It hasn't been OK for a long time.

I also went to receive Biofeedback, which is going to help me learn how to relax my body. So far I have only been to one treatment, but it already has proven to be helpful.

Since then I have been reading books, packets of information — anything I can get my hands on in terms of PTSD. Prior to this, my knowledge on the subject was minimal. Here it was, affecting my life, and aside from knowing the symptoms I did not know what the official term stood for.

According to the Web site psych.org/public_info/ptsd.html, PTSD affects people who have survived earthquakes, airplane crashes, terrorist bombings, inner-city violence, domestic abuse, rape, war, genocide and other disasters.

Some people can recover without treatment.

Others cannot.

For them there are several options for them to experiment with. I am relying primarily on behavior therapy. This is where the mental process is examined and relaxation techniques are learned. Psychodynamic therapy helps the individual examine their own behavior and how the experience effected them. There are several other means of "healing," such as group and family therapy, or medication if needed.

The Web site health-center.com has a list of symptoms that can be found in association with PTSD. These include increased arousal such as difficulty sleeping, irritability or angry outbursts, difficulty concentrating and an exaggerated startle response.

Panic attacks also can result in cases of anxiety.

Those who experience PTSD might freeze up, become disoriented or hysterical. They might become violent if mishandled, especially if someone tries to hold them down. This is when their survival mode kicks in.

As a society there needs to be more of an awareness on PTSD. There needs to be more of an understanding of the symptoms and ultimately the different methods of treatment.

To obtain more information write to the National Center for PTSD, VA Medical Center (116D), White River Junction, VT, 05009. Or you can contact them by calling 1-802-296-5132. Their Web site is dartmouth.edu/dms/ptsd.

Besides learning about this disorder, there is something else that must be done.

Most people do not receive proper care because they have been raised in a society that suggests therapy is equivalent to incompetence. They have been raised in a society that regards those who receive help or assistance as being weak.

There is nothing weak about those who have been through hell.

Nothing.

Nation's attentive attitude towards government won't last long

It has been a great week in the United States.

Doubts still linger about whether George W. Bush or Al Gore will serve as the nation's 43rd chief executive, but it was yet another clear victory for the American political process.

Contrary to what many extreme conservatives or liberals might tell you, the United States is not doomed.

The president-elect is not going to run the country into the ground.

The American people will not refuse to accept a president who captured his office without winning a majority of the American people's support or even received several thousand fewer votes than his chief competitor.

The populace will not rise up in protest of the election's results.

In fact, quite the opposite will happen.

Rather than rise up in arms against their new leader, Americans will accept him.

This is not to say everyone will go to their new president with open arms. Some will accept him slowly, not excited about the election's outcome.

Others will embrace him enthusiastically, ecstatic that their candidate finished on top.

Still others, oblivious to the political world around them, will accept him because that is what they are told to do.

Regardless of how warmly each American welcomes the new president, he will take office.

On Jan. 20, a new president will be sworn in to replace Bill Clinton. There will be whining and there will be small protests. But there will be a new president.

A few weeks later, things will return to normal.

Normal, unfortunately, is complete apathy for the political process.

Few Americans fully appreciate what their government provides for them. A strong military, social security, police protection, transportation and countless other services are often taken for granted.

But for one shining week, politics took center stage.

Tuesday night became like the Super Bowl, albeit one with lame commercials. And, unlike most Super Bowls, this contest lived up to its billing.

For the first time in most of our lifetimes, the presidential race went down to the wire — then into overtime.

Just like a good sporting event, this drama got our attention. We were enraptured with the intrigue, caught up in the possibilities.

People from both sides of the aisle continued to hold out hope for days that their team would rally for the win.

But when all is said is done, those on the losing team will concede defeat. They will acknowledge the rightful succession of their opposition and allow power to transfer peacefully to the new president.

The American people, however, probably will fail to realize the power with which they have been entrusted. They were able to shift the direction of the most powerful nation on Earth without fighting, bloodshed, bribery or overt deceit.

They continue to have power. Many people are ready to end the electoral college system, but it probably won't happen. With a little pressure on their congressmen, citizens could force the end to a controversial system that many consider archaic.

But that won't happen.

Within a matter of weeks, the masses will forget about this election and the issues surrounding it. Instead, they will turn their focus back to more pressing matters.

After all, we're in the midst of football season.

Better system needed for football admission

Editor,

The new ticket policy that has gone into affect earlier this year is full of faults. Athletics Director Max Urlick says his two reasons for implementing this policy were to stop non-students from sitting in the general admission seating, and to stop the GA section from being overcrowded.

First of all, making the students bring IDs is not going to make the stands any less crowded. How crowded the stands are solely depends on how many tickets are sold and how many people are allowed into the seating area.

Second, not only will letting students sit in GA will stop opposing teams from being able to sit there, but it also stops fellow K-State supporters that are not students from sitting in GA. This includes students' parents, siblings and friends.

The real problem is trying to find a way to keep opposing teams from getting into student section.

My solution to the problem is called the buddy system. This policy would allow any K-State student with a student ID to bring in with them up to two non-K-State students who have GA tickets.

This would slow down the chance of opposing fans getting in, because frankly, who would want to buddy up with a Nebraska fan? In fact, an opposing fan, knowing they would have to buddy up, would be less likely to even try and get into the GA. Urlick's policy was a quick fix, and was not thought out when it was implemented.

K-State students should be able to bring their parents or younger sibling to the game and sit in GA.

We shouldn't just sit by and let our freedom be taken away.

Dean deserves thanks for advances in library

Editor,

On behalf of the entire student body, we would like to thank Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, and his staff for the outstanding job they have done in preparing the upcoming changes to Hale library.

Beginning a week before finals, the library hours will change, Sunday through Thursday, by staying open until 2 a.m. The library will continue to operate with the new hours indefinitely. In addition to the extended hours, 90 new computer "workstations" will be installed throughout the library with the Microsoft Office Suite. This will allow students to type reports or work on any other computing tasks.

K-State ranks last in the Big 12 in terms of the library's operating hours. The new changes will pull us up to fifth place. Students no longer will be able to complain about the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex staying open later than the library. Let us show our appreciation to Dean Hobrock and all who have made this possible by thanking them for these changes.

Basketball club seeks to improve faculty, community involvement

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Introducing a new format, style and venue to the Wildcat basketball program just wasn't enough for Jim Wooldridge.

As a first-year head coach at K-State, reaching out to the community was an absolute necessity, he said.

"It's very important. We try to make an effort to get the students — this is our home base," Wooldridge said. "We want to cultivate the people that are here at our school — the students, faculty and staff."

With that in mind, the Wildcat Faculty/Staff Club was formed.

Wooldridge created the group, whose first meeting is set for Monday, with one main objective: to give staff members at K-State a close association with Wildcat men's basketball.

"Our staff wants to reach out to as many groups as we can," Wooldridge said. "A huge and very important group is the faculty and staff here. We have to have them involved here as much as the students."

Jimmy Elgas, director of basketball operations, is leading the club, and said each session would highlight a different aspect of the basketball program.

Such aspects include in-depth looks at the same highlight tapes and scouting reports that Wooldridge and his staff present to their players, as well as discussions on recruiting and academic issues.

"We're going to give them inside information about opponents, specific game plans, maybe injury updates," Elgas said. "Basically, it's a no-holds-barred, honest look at our program."

And honesty is the best policy, Wooldridge said.

"I just think people appreciate an honest evaluation and honesty to answers about what's happening in your program and with your team," he said. "I believe it telling people that, and they can make their own assessment."

That assessment can be taken two ways, as Wooldridge acknowledges the fact that fans can easily be disturbed by a losing ball club, even if he does his part by reaching out and being personable.

"Everyone wants quick results, and sure there are going to be people that are dissatisfied with what you're doing, but we can't concentrate on that," he said.

"We've got to concentrate on the positive, tell people the truth about where we are and what we're doing, and believe in what we're doing — that it's going to work and we're going to have a good program in the future."

However, rebuilding a program takes time and effort, Wooldridge said, and he hopes fans see accordingly.

"We've asked people to be patient. That's another reason for me to be out in front and for me to be out in the public — to tell them where we are and be honest with them, because I believe in that," Wooldridge said. "This is where we are, this is what's happening in the program, this is what's happening with your team."

"Are they going to be quick to jump off? Some will, some are going to jump off and be critical very quickly. But I think a lot of them will stay with us, too."

Regardless, Elgas said the Faculty/Staff Club will benefit people interested in Wildcat basketball.

"It's just a chance for our faculty and staff members to meet with the coaches," he said. "It's intended to give them a first-hand look of how a basketball program is run, and really how an athletics program is run. We're gearing it to people who care about K-State athletics, specifically basketball."

Elgas said the format of the club, which meets once a month from 11:45 a.m. to 12:45 p.m. in Union 212, includes a brown bag lunch in which faculty and staff can discuss K-State basketball in an informal setting.

"We're going to give them the opportunity to ask any question they want to ask about anything within our program," Wooldridge said. "There's not going to be media there, there's not going to be anybody there but us, and I just think it's a very good way of communicating with people on our campus that have an interest in men's basketball."

"And whatever they want to know, that's what I'm going to tell them. I'm going to answer anything they ask."

Shawn Nestor, men's basketball contact at K-State Sports Information, said Wooldridge's idea of starting a faculty/staff club was a good one.

"I think overall, with the last couple of years, he's just trying to get the faculty and staff involved with the whole program," Nestor said. "I think that's one of his goals."

Meanwhile, Elgas said he'd like to see a big turnout in the club's first meeting Monday.

"We hope to have 20 to 30 people at our first one and have it snowball from there," he said Thursday. "I've gotten a good 10-12 e-mails today from people that think it's a fantastic idea."

Yet, Elgas said the numbers aren't the issue.

"I don't care if it's just 12 people that come — those 12 people are important to us," he said. "It doesn't matter if there's five or 100, there are all important to us."

March recognizes Holocaust victims

By TONY CZUCZKA
The Associated Press

BERLIN — More than 200,000 people solemnly marched through the German capital Thursday in memory of victims of Kristallnacht, the Nazis' 1938 anti-Jewish pogrom that prefaced the Holocaust and is echoed menacingly in recent attacks on immigrants and synagogues.

Marchers packed central Berlin for the main commemoration of the anniversary, culminating weeks of pleas by civic leaders for the nation to stand up against hate crimes and the far right. Thousands more demonstrated in other cities across Germany, walking in silent protest or, in the northern city of Bremerhaven, forming a 7 1/2-mile human chain.

Hoisting banners against racism and green balloons emblazoned with "No to Neo-Nazis," the demonstrators — led by Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder — trooped through the chilly evening from prewar Berlin's main synagogue to a rally at the Brandenburg Gate.

Speakers drew connections between the resurgent neo-Nazi attacks of recent months to Nov. 9, 1938, the "Night of Broken Glass" when synagogues and Jewish businesses across Germany were attacked in a Nazi-orchestrated campaign and many Jews were sent to concentration camps.

"Can you imagine what goes on inside of us when we experience that Germans are once again setting alight our synagogues, desecrating our cemeteries, sending death and bomb threats to our homes?" said Paul Spiegel, head of Germany's Jewish community.

He lashed out at conservative politicians for whipping up a national debate on immigration and suggesting that minorities had to adopt German culture. Such language amounted to verbally playing with fire, Spiegel said.

Addressing an applauding crowd earlier outside the golden-domed synagogue, the leader of Berlin's Jewish community urged Germans to follow the example of the upstanding police officer who prevented Nazi SA storm troopers from torching the synagogue on that night 62 years ago.

"This example teaches us: by standing together, by not looking away, you can change history," Andreas Nachama said. A cantor said kaddish — the Jewish prayer for the dead — outside the synagogue.

Volleyball team goes on road to take on KU in 2nd meeting of season

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team heads to Lawrence on Saturday for a crucial battle with intrastate rival Kansas.

The Cats (17-6, 11-4) have had troubles winning on the road this season, as all six of the teams' losses have come away from Manhattan. Head coach Jim McLaughlin said his team's lack of experience is the reason for the Cats' faltering when they travel.

"Last year we were good on the road, this year we're younger and we're affected by different things," he said. "We're distracted easily, and that's just being immature a little bit on the road and we need to be mature and handle stuff. But, we talked about it, we were better at Texas. We need to go on the road and stay focused, get into our routines and get after KU."

The Cats won their last road game, coming from behind to defeat Texas 3-2. Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner said that win was extremely important in building the team's confidence away from Ahearn Field House.

"We have been struggling on the road," Wegner said. "But we went to Texas and took care of business. Now we go to KU and the atmosphere there is tough to play in, too, and they're going to be fired up. We've just got to be ready to play hard."

The game Saturday is extremely important for the Cats, McLaughlin said. With their win against Missouri on Wednesday night, the Cats moved into sole possession of second place in the conference. Two teams from the Big 12 will be host to NCAA Tournament games this year, and K-State is in the driver's seat. If the Cats win out, they will finish in second place.

Conversely, Kansas is 5-11 in the Big 12 and has little chance at making the postseason. McLaughlin said it will be a dangerous game for K-State, though, as the Hawks look to take the role of the spoiler.

"I anticipate their emotional level will be real high," he said. "They're done, the season is over for them. They probably can't get to the NCAA Tournament, so the next best thing will be to beat K-State. Emotionally they'll be pretty high, but I've never felt you can win a match on emotion. You win by executing and sharing emotion to keep each other's energy up."

The Cats had plenty of energy when they met the Hawks earlier in the season. The Cats pulled off a three-game sweep, beating the Hawks 15-6, 17-15 and 15-13 at home. The win extended K-State's winning streak to 11 matches over KU.

Freshman middle blocker Lauren Goehring said that despite their record and the Cats' earlier success against them, Kansas will be ready to play.

"It's going to be tough," Goehring said. "They're going to be at home and they'll be pretty jacked-up to play us, but we'll play tougher."

Wildcats sign 2 top recruit standouts from Big 12 area

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Jim McLaughlin announced Wednesday the signing of two prep standouts, both of which inked national letters of intent to play volleyball for K-State in 2001.

■ Katie Stanzel, native of Omaha, Neb., has been labeled as the top recruit out of Nebraska. The 6-foot, 1-inch middle blocker becomes just the sixth player from the volleyball-rich Cornhusker state to sign with K-State under McLaughlin.

Stanzel led Omaha's Marian High School to a 25-15 record this season, while ranking second in Class A with 5.10 kills per game and third in digs with a 4.80 per game average.

"Katie has a very good feel for the game," McLaughlin said. "That, combined with her speed, I believe are the components that will help our team the most in the coming years. Her ability to pass and get outside were primarily what we were looking for in an outside hitter in this class."

"She also caught our eye with her ability to block. I really like everything about her. She really wants to be the best player she's capable of becoming at this level, and I think we can help her do that here."

■ The other signee is Houston, Texas, product Gabby Guerre. The 6-foot, 1-inch setter/outside hitter has been a letterwinner and starter at Mayde Creek High School for the past three seasons, leading the squad with 14 assists and nine kills per match.

"I love the way Gabby delivers the ball," McLaughlin said. "She has a nice release and, as a result, she has very good location. Hitters always seemed to be in a rhythm when she was playing, and I think that is a function of a setter's ability to deliver the ball that needs to be hit."

"She has got two things that we think will make her unique as a setter, in that, she has the height at 6-foot-1 and she is a lefty."

As Gabby develops and gets familiar with the situations that occur at a high level, she will be a very good setter at this level."

However, that potential won't come without hard work and dedication, McLaughlin said.

"The challenge for her will be to make a commitment in the off-season to upgrade her agility and foot speed. She is a very intelligent player, and she just needs to get the experience of playing at this level."

Nevertheless, Mayde Creek head coach Cathy Reeves said Guerre's talent goes beyond the volleyball court.

"The success of our team comes directly from the leadership and ability of Gabby," Reeves said. "She is a leader in every sense of the word. She was our heart and soul this season."

"She is also dedicated and focused player that is very unselfish. She demands a lot from herself and pushes very hard to be the very best. She will do whatever it takes to be an impact player at Kansas State."

In fact, McLaughlin said both of the new signees will be wonderful additions to his volleyball program.

"We put a lot of time and effort into getting these talented individuals to Kansas State," he said. "We think they are a very good match for this program and where we see this program going in the next few years. They have the ability and the competitive desire to be as good as possible on the volleyball court."

"I also think they are genuinely solid individuals with good character. How they develop at the college level will depend on how they pick up our systems and how committed they are to being the best they possibly can be on the court. If they do these things, I think there is no limit to what they can accomplish at the collegiate level."

Men's rowing team works toward more consistency

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Improvement seems to be a recurring goal for the K-State men's rowing team, and the squad is starting to produce, head coach Al Koch said.

"I think that our kids are rowing much better this year," he said, "but the other side of that is the other guys are, too."

It's been a successful fall for this year's squad with high finishes at almost every regatta, but the team's lack of consistency has kept the Wildcats a level below perennially strong teams like the University of Wisconsin, Koch said.

"When Wisconsin takes six of the top seven spots at the Head of the Iowa," Koch said, "it's obvious that they are still the cream of the crop."

But Koch isn't content with the team's random success and vows to accomplish the team's goal of improvement every outing.

"From a coaching perspective, I don't think you're ever where you want to be," he said. "We've got a fairly large squad, and they'll mature and do well. One of our goals is to see more consistency in the team."

That consistency seemed to be part of the crew's plan early, when the Cats' season started off well Sept. 30 in Des Moines, Iowa, with the team placing fourth in both the open-four and open-eight races.

Next up was the Head of the Mississippi, where the Cats' open-eight squad placed third after picking up a minute penalty, when the team missed one of the course's buoys.

The American Royal Fall Rowing Classic followed in Kansas City, Mo., and although K-State could only manage a seventh place finish in the novice eight race, the Wildcats' varsity squad took second to Colorado, finishing just five seconds behind the Buffaloes. Combined, the team took home five medals from the event Oct. 15.

In its first race experience of the year, K-State's novice boat placed fifth in the eight race, two minutes off pace-setter Wichita State. Freshman Nick Steffen said he thinks the novice players are coming along fine, and hopes the new team members will be competitive soon.

"As a whole, the novice are doing pretty well," Steffen said. "Everybody is getting out to practice and working harder. Hopefully, we'll be able to build a good boat and compete well."

After the American Royal regatta, the team made its first appearance at the Head of the Charles in Boston, the largest two-day rowing event in the world since the late 1980s. Captain Jeff Tignor said it was the high-point of the season because of the size and importance of the tournament.

Fifty-five boats were entered in the race, including nationally crewed teams and schools from the East Coast, an area rich in rowing tradition and talent, Tignor said. After a 60-second penalty was tacked on to the Wildcats' boat, the team posted an official time of 17:34.98, finishing 53rd in the race.

On Oct. 29, Iowa City was host to K-State and top rowing schools like Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Tignor said the Wildcats finished where they thought they would in the open-eight race — eighth — behind six Badger boats and one from Minnesota.

"I would say we did as good as would've liked to," Tignor said.

In what many members of the crew thought of as the team's toughest regatta of the fall season, the team finished just 1:37.46 behind first-place Wisconsin.

The team wrapped up competition last weekend with a sixth-place finish out of 14 boats in the varsity four race on Wichita's Little River. Tignor said the fall has been proof of what the club can do, displaying potential for a strong spring showing.

"I would say it was a success," Tignor said. "We just continually improved and our technique, as a whole, has improved a lot. We've laid a good foundation for what we're going to do in the spring."

Men's, women's cross country teams look to improve record, stabilize playing pattern

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

As the K-State cross country team enters the last leg of the season, the competition is really beginning to heat up.

After its second-place finish in the Oct. 28 Big 12 Championships, the women's squad is looking to win their third consecutive overall Midwest Regional championship this weekend in Waterloo, Iowa.

The women's squad, ranked eighth nationally according to the FinishLynx/NCAA poll, is the top-ranked team in the Midwest region and is looking to continue its strong performance at the Championship event.

Last year, K-State runners Amy Mortimer, Korene Hinds, Annie Wetterhus and Amanda

Crouse finished first, second, fourth and fifth, respectively, in the individual competition.

Placing well overall is vital for both the men's and women's team, as only the top two overall teams, as well as the first four individual runners not on qualifying squads, will advance to the NCAA Championships, which will be in Ames, Iowa, on Nov. 20.

Meanwhile, the men's team, which has been inconsistent throughout the year, will face only one top-25 ranked team in its 29-team field.

Oklahoma State, which enters the championship ranked 13th nationally, will be the men's toughest overall competition on the 10,000-meter trail at Warren Golf Course.

While the men's team is not favored to win the event, one runner to watch for the Wildcats is junior Shadrack Kimeli.

Kimeli, in his first year of competition for K-State, was the top Wildcat finisher in each event he competed in this year. In addition, he recently was named the Big 12 Conference Newcomer of the Year after his fifth place finish at the Big 12 Championships.

Unless the men's squad finishes in the top two, Kimeli will have to finish no worse than fourth individually to qualify for the NCAA Championships.

The NCAA Midwest Regionals will begin at 11 a.m. Saturday with the women's 6,000-meter race, followed by a 12:15 p.m. start for the men's 10,000-meter event.

Due to travel conflicts, head coach Randy Cole was unavailable for comment.

Eleanor, played by Mary Elizabeth Atwood, prepares to go discuss who would inherit the throne of England with King Henry II, played by David Smit. Henry wants their youngest son, John, to inherit the throne, while Eleanor wants the oldest son, Richard, to be the successor.

Royal Family Squabble

Characters' arguments create conflict of play, give actors good experience

By DAVID LAUNDER
Kansas State Collegian

Family gatherings sometimes might have conflicts, but none as big as the one that takes place in "The Lion In Winter."

The play, which will be performed at the Manhattan Arts Center the next two weekends, is centered around an argument between King Henry II of England and Eleanor of Aquitaine, his queen.

Written by James Goldman, "The Lion In Winter" is a piece that tries to please all audiences, director Penny Senften said.

"We thought this was a play people wanted to see," Senften said. "It has a lot of witty and funny lines."

Set during the holiday season, the play's conflicts arise during a royal family gathering.

King Henry, his wife and their three sons gather with King Phillip of France and his sister, Alais, who also is Henry's mistress.

Eleanor and King Henry fight throughout the play about who should be the next king.

Eleanor believes it should be their oldest surviving son, Richard the Lionheart, and King Henry believes it should be the youngest son, John.

The argument persists throughout the play with several other characters who complicate the plot.

Senften said this gathering creates a great deal of conflict, and makes the characters more interesting.

"I have a great part," said David Smit, who plays King Henry and also is a professor of English at K-State. "It really gives me a chance to rant and rave."

Along with Smit, many other K-Staters are a part of "The Lion In Winter."

Rebekah Dryden, junior in theater, who plays Alais, said the play has been a great experience.

"It has given me an opportunity to work with a wide variety of people,"

she said. "Working with this cast has been very rewarding."

Nick Wasinger, junior in electrical engineering, who plays King Phillip, said he also has enjoyed working with this cast.

"It has been fun," he said. "Everybody here likes to joke and have a good time."

Taking place in France in 1183, Senften said the show has proven that it is not out of date.

It originally opened on Broadway, and also was performed in Manhattan in 1983.

From beginning to end, Senften said this play has been a success.

"We had a super turnout for auditions," she said. "The cast and crew has been terrific. I couldn't have asked for anything better."

Tony-nominated play comes to Junction City

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

When a newlywed wife and an elderly man switch bodies, the audience watches to find out how the husband deals with it in "Prelude To A Kiss."

"Prelude To A Kiss" opens Friday at the Junction City Little Theatre. The play was nominated for a Tony Award in 1990, but is familiar to most people because of the movie version starring Meg Ryan and Alec Baldwin.

Director Eric Stahl said the light-hearted play deals with serious matters in relationships.

"It's a very charming, funny play," Stahl said. "Still, it asks the serious question of whether or not you can still love someone who has gone through drastic changes. It's a good story, and I think people will leave the theater smiling."

"Prelude To A Kiss" revolves around Peter, played by Larry Lay, and what goes through his mind as he realizes his wife, Rita, and an old man have switched places. Lay gives monologues to explain what he is thinking throughout the play.

Stage Manager Erica Purdy, sophomore in music education, said because Lay is in every scene of the play, many of his costume changes are right in front of the audience.

"For Peter, we have to make sure he has the right costume on stage with him during the certain scenes because most of the time he just changes while he's talking," she said. "In one scene he just takes off one shirt, with another costume underneath."

Erin Fast, who plays Rita, said while being in every scene of the play can test an actor's endurance, playing an old man inside a young woman can test an actor in other ways. She said it was like playing two different characters and for each, there are different characteristics.

"It's challenging because since I have the soul of an old man I have to emulate those mannerisms," Fast, senior in theater, said. "When I'm walking I have a slump, I blink more often and things like that. It's hard to be subtle and still have it come across to the audience what is going on."

Stahl said making the switch look believable was the goal for him, keeping the audience waiting to find out if Rita will be able to switch back.

Stahl said it is meant to be an adult fairy tale with supernatural phenomena, true love hanging in the balance, and a story with meaning.

Fast said "Prelude To A Kiss" is a touching play that keeps the audience's attention because of its bizarre plot twists. She said she hopes people leave the play pleased and thinking one thing.

"When the play is over and the people walk out of the theater I want them to think 'I want to have a love like that,'" she said. "I want them to get the message that love conquers all."

still love someone who has gone through drastic changes. It's a good story, and I think people will leave the theater smiling." "Prelude To A Kiss" revolves around Peter, played by Larry Lay, and what goes through his mind as he realizes his wife, Rita, and an old man have switched places. Lay gives monologues to explain what he is thinking throughout the play. Stage Manager Erica Purdy, sophomore in music education, said because Lay is in every scene of the play, many of his costume changes are right in front of the audience. "For Peter, we have to make sure he has the right costume on stage with him during the certain scenes because most of the time he just changes while he's talking," she said. "In one scene he just takes off one shirt, with another costume underneath." Erin Fast, who plays Rita, said while being in every scene of the play can test an actor's endurance, playing an old man inside a young woman can test an actor in other ways. She said it was like playing two different characters and for each, there are different characteristics. "It's challenging because since I have the soul of an old man I have to emulate those mannerisms," Fast, senior in theater, said. "When I'm walking I have a slump, I blink more often and things like that. It's hard to be subtle and still have it come across to the audience what is going on."

Stahl said making the switch look believable was the goal for him, keeping the audience waiting to find out if Rita will be able to switch back. Stahl said it is meant to be an adult fairy tale with supernatural phenomena, true love hanging in the balance, and a story with meaning. Fast said "Prelude To A Kiss" is a touching play that keeps the audience's attention because of its bizarre plot twists. She said she hopes people leave the play pleased and thinking one thing. "When the play is over and the people walk out of the theater I want them to think I want to have a love like that," she said. "I want them to get the message that love conquers all."

Pheasant season to open this weekend; local businesses prepare for additional customers

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

Local businesses are preparing for the K-State-Nebraska game this weekend, but another event also will draw thousands to Manhattan — pheasant season opening weekend.

"This weekend is the busiest opening weekend in Kansas," said Bob Mathews, chief of information for the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks. "We get between 100,000 and 110,000 hunters, and about 30,000 of them are non-residents."

The pheasant season runs from Saturday through Jan. 31. With so many hunters coming to town, it has an effect on several Manhattan businesses.

For Mike Weisbender, owner of Ole Mike's Shooters Supply and Tackle, opening weekend brings him more business.

"We usually have a lot of hunters come in," Weisbender said. "Opening weekend brings a lot of people in to buy ammunition and hunting licenses."

Weisbender said hunters also come in to buy hunting apparel, guns and gun cleaning products.

"Out-of-state hunters usually buy licenses," Weisbender said. "They generally don't buy too much because they're already stocked up."

Wal-Mart also is another popular stop for hunters on opening weekend. Aaron North, a sporting goods salesman, said that the customers have doubled over last week, and they will continue to increase until Saturday.

"Opening weekend brings in lots of out-of-state hunters," North said. "It increases our customer base."

Mrs. Clyde's Kansas Steakhouse is another local business that likes to see hunters come to town.

"It's hard to say how many come in," CJ Owren, office manager at Mrs. Clyde's, said. "We look forward to seeing hunters. They generally come in in the evenings when they get back into town."

With so many hunters coming into the area, it is important to be safe and know the rules of hunting.

The daily limit for pheasants is four roosters (males) per hunter. The standard hunting time is from a half-hour before sunrise until sunset.

All hunters must have a basic hunting license to hunt pheasant. Any hunter that was born on or after July 1, 1957, must have completed a hunter's safety course. All hunters under the age of 27 are required to carry a hunter's safety card with them while they hunt.

Hunters need to keep in mind that permission is required to hunt any private land. Private land can be posted with signs or purple paint. Land owners can mark their property with purple paint, indicating that a hunter must ask permission to hunt the land.

Riley County does have six tracts of land that are available for walk-in hunting. No permission is required to hunt this land. The Tuttle Creek Wildlife Area also is open to hunters.

Blaze-orange clothing is an accessory hunters need to consider, because most hunting accidents occur during the bird seasons.

"Orange clothing is not required for bird hunting, but it is highly recommended," Mathews said.

National heritage month offers cultural, social ties for students

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

For American Indian students at K-State, finding a sense of community and friendship is important. The American Indian student population is one of the smallest on campus, making the Native American Student Body organization an important link — both culturally and socially — for its 20 members.

Jacob Hawkins, president of the Native American Student Body, explained the importance of the club's existence at K-State.

"Our organization tries to create a community-type environment for our members," he said. "Since Native Americans are such a small group on campus, we try to create a bond of friendship among our members."

The club meets at 5:30 p.m. every other Wednesday in the K-State Student Union. Hawkins said one of the organization's goals is bringing speakers to the meetings whose presentations will interest and inform both native and non-native students.

"While we try to bring speakers whose issues will apply to students at K-State and also residents of Manhattan, we also bring in speakers whose issues will interest those students who are not involved in our club and who are not Native American," he said. "Anyone is welcome to come to our meetings. Our purpose is to educate others about our culture."

The NASB plans a number of activities each year, especially during the months of November and April. November is National Native American Heritage Month, and K-State has designated April as its own Native American Heritage Month. In past years, speakers and artists have visited the campus during these months and presented different aspects of the American Indian culture to the student body. Hawkins said the club also plans a social gathering with other cultural organizations on campus.

Tamara Saw Saw-Goodson, former NASB president, said it is important that recognition of Native American Heritage Month continues.

"This continent was first populated by Native Americans," she said. "This month just brings awareness to Native American people and our culture and the social and economic problems that still face our people. Any kind of awareness is good. We aren't just a people of the past—our beliefs and our culture continue to exist today."

heritage. Speakers, support groups and special activities are presented this month on campus.

There will be a speaker coming to talk about national laws, which personally affect tribes on a daily basis, Baldwin said.

"It is important for days and months to be set aside to celebrate Native American heritage because it provides people with the opportunity to learn more and experience cultures that are different from one's own," Prins said.

groups wanting to help," she said.

Last year, Seim worked with the construction science and architecture department to build the model of Nichols Hall with the donated cans at the Manhattan Town Center. This year, Seim said, a model of Anderson Hall will be built and there will be a raffle to guess how many cans were used in the model.

So far, this year there are 30,000 pounds of food and $2,000 in donations, Seim said. This has resulted from trick or treating for cans, raffle money and parking money from the football games, she said.

Seim said it is not so much the reward she gets from doing her part, but what she has learned.

"Being a college student, I didn't know there was such a need in Manhattan," she said. "It really hits you and you don't know how lucky you are."

Catterson, who has organized many of the food drives among the Greek houses, said he was surprised at the need as well.

"I came from a well-off family, so I never knew there was so much need," he said. "It's neat to see how the community is willing to help these people. It's kind of a feel-good thing."

PURPLE PRIDE HUSKER HEARTACHE

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

As the goal posts came crashing down at KSU Stadium, so, too, went a history of heartache and affliction.

Nov. 14, 1998: The Red Sea was parted.

K-State climbed the mountain and ended 29 years of frustration with a 40-30 victory over Nebraska, and as the final seconds ticked off the clock, the crowd of 44,298 rushed the field in a chaotic frenzy.

The burden was gone.

"It took us about half an hour to get from the 6-yard line into the end zone," junior left guard Andy Eby said, "because people were just mobbing you and giving you handshake, and patting your helmet and patting you on the back. It was a pretty exciting time."

Excitement was an understatement, said junior offensive tackle John Robertson, who remembers well the aftermath of the Cat victory.

"It was insane. It was just a great feeling to be a part of a team that was able to break that 30-game losing streak," he said, "and then the fans and the crowd were just so proud of it. I was just glad that I was a part of what took place."

What took place was a story for the record books.

With 8:22 left in the ball game, Nebraska took a 30-27 lead on Sheldon Jackson's 9-yard touchdown reception from quarterback Eric Crouch. But the Cats and signal-caller Michael Bishop countered, engineering a 2:57 drive that was capped by wide-out Darnell McDonald's 11-yard TD grab.

Yet, the Huskers had over five minutes to wield a comeback.

However, that chance was thwarted as defensive end Joe Bob Clements jarred the ball loose from Crouch, and linebacker Jeff Kelly returned the fumble 23 yards for a touch-down to clinch a Cat victory.

Cats not letting emotion get in way of win

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Bill Snyder hopes he won't need to take any of his players to the emergency room prior to K-State's contest with Nebraska on Saturday.

But he's not referring to physical injuries. He's talking about mental ones.

"I would suggest that if you're 21 years old, and you're going to play year-in and year-out one of the very finest football teams in the nation that if you couldn't get some emotion, some enthusiasm and excitement for that, we probably better get you over to the doctor and get you checked out," Snyder said with a laugh. "You've got some problems."

Yet, Snyder isn't worried about that, as he said he'd like to think his team has ample motivation for this weekend's matchup, which pits No. 16/11 K-State (8-2, 4-2) against No. 4/5 Nebraska (8-1, 5-1) at KSU Stadium in Manhattan.

However, he doesn't deny its importance.

"I think emotion is important in any ball game that you play," Snyder said. "Regardless of who you happen to line up and play against, if you attempt to play without it, you set yourself up for some difficult times, I would think. It's important to me, and it's important to our players. They understand that, and I understand that."

That understanding heightens the necessity of keeping a steady approach to gameday, regardless of the opponent, Snyder said, as his team cannot worry about any intangibles associated with this year's K-State/Nebraska game.

"If you approach each one with the same venue — that says what we really need to do is focus on our preparation."

"Work as hard as we possibly can, work at game tempo during the course of the week the best that we possibly can and concentrate totally Nebraska cornerback Tyler Rauenzahn waves to the crowd as he leaves the field after the Cornhuskers' 41-15 victory over the Wildcats last season in Lincoln.

on our preparation in what we need to do — then the rest of it probably takes care of itself on gameday. If you're well prepared, you'll play well."

Sounds simple, but things aren't that easy on the playing field, considering Nebraska is a consistent contender for the national championship. It's almost like K-State is playing for the title each and every

QUICK FACTS

- A K-State victory over Nebraska would clinch the Cats' eighth consecutive nine-win season. Meanwhile, a Husker win would mark their 31st straight nine-win year, a NCAA record.
- Since the inception of the Big 12, Nebraska (33-5) and K-State (32-6) have the best records in conference games of all dozen schools. In fact, only Florida State (38-1 in the ACC) and Florida (34-5 in the SEC) post better records in league play than the Wildcats and Huskers since 1996.
- K-State and Nebraska are two of only 13 Division I-A teams with at least eight wins this season.
- Nebraska sits atop the Big 12 North Division with a 5-1 record, while K-State remains one game back at 4-2. A Husker win this weekend would clinch NU a berth in the Big 12 Championship game, but with Cat wins both Saturday and Nov. 18 at Missouri, K-State would represent the North in the title game.
- The Wildcats are coming off a 56-10 victory over Iowa State at KSU Stadium, while the Huskers bounced back from their first loss of the season to Oklahoma with a 56-17 trouncing of Kansas.
- David Allen needs just 66 punt-return yards against Nebraska to tie the NCAA career punt return record of 1,695 yards by Lee Nalley of Vanderbilt (1947-49).

Cyclones restore offensive confidence

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

For three consecutive weeks, starting with its loss to Oklahoma, K-State's ability to move the ball and score points was questioned by fans and the media.

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley's accuracy and leadership were questioned. The receivers' ability to catch the ball was questioned, as was the entire team's dedication to running the ball.

So when K-State posted 583 yards and 56 points on Iowa State last Saturday, the Cats let out a collective sigh of relief. They had shown on the field what they had known they could do all along, tailback Josh Scobey said.

"There was a point in time last week when we felt like our backs were against the wall, and we wanted to come out and show people that we could run the ball and have a balanced attack," he said. "It was something we knew we always had, but it was just time to show it."

And the Cats didn't just want to prove to themselves they could move the ball effectively. Conversely, the entire country needed to be shown K-State's offensive potential, offensive tackle John Robertson said.

"We came out with a mission, motivated that we were going to let the nation know that we can play Kansas State football like the teams in the past have, and that was a big motivator for us to get back on track," he said. "It does affect your mental state. Everybody kind of has their ups and downs."

The struggle is not over now that the Cats have had one good performance, however. The biggest test still looms Saturday, Robertson said.

"We've got to carry over that attitude that we had last week, and play just as hard as we did and be ready for the Huskers," he said.

Unlike Iowa State, however, which granted almost 400 yards a game to opposing offenses, Nebraska is allowing just a stingy 300 yards of total offense, 100 yards of which are on the ground, a stat the Cats discovered first hand last year in Lincoln.

K-State only could muster a paltry 92 yards rushing and 142 passing yards at Memorial Stadium, 55 of which came on one pass to Morgan. A plus, or possibly a minus, depending how one looks at it, is that most of the starters that endured last year's beating are back this year.

The Cats think it's a plus, offensive guard Andy Eby said.

"We're pretty much the same offense as we were last year, but guys are a lot more experienced — guys are a lot more confident. We've kind of proven ourselves in a couple of games," he said.

"Knowing that we can score points, we can be a quick-strike offense like we were in '98, or we can be a long drive offense."

That multi-faceted attack has even drawn praise from Nebraska's head coach Frank Solich.

"It will be a challenge to stop the run. They've always thrown the ball well, and so that makes them without question, a very difficult offense to prepare for," he said. "They've got very good team speed. They've got an excellent, experienced quarterback. Those are really tough combinations to match up with when you're trying to slow people down."

Still, though, K-State's offensive goal for every game of 200 yards rushing and 200 yards passing will be difficult to achieve against the Nebraska's defense — but it's not impossible, Eby said.

"It's realistic as long as we execute. It really doesn't depend so much on what they do because they do what they do. They're not going to change — they're Nebraska's defense," he said. "It's just how well we execute against them — it really comes down to one-on-one blocks."

And if the offense, and especially the linemen, are prepared, expect nothing less than that goal of 400 yards, Scobey said.

"I have 100-percent confidence that those guys are going to play even better than they did last week," he said. "We're going to go in, and I know they're going to play, and I know we're going to have a great ball game."

Nebraska coach recognizes K-State's tough road to national recognition

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Nebraska head coach Frank Solich won't deny that K-State has a good football team.

In fact, he respects it.

"Ten years ago, when you look at it that long ago, probably there's going to be some question as to where the program would go, how far it would move up in terms of not only conference recognition, but national recognition," Solich said. "That's true of any program that was in that state, 10, 12, 15 years ago."

However, much of that rise can be attributed to K-State head coach Bill Snyder, Solich said.

"I think Bill and his staff have done an outstanding job to bring that program at a level, where not only is it recognized as a great program within the conference, but it's really recognized as a great program on the national level," he said. "You don't do that without establishing a lot of consistency within your program, and that's one thing, I believe, they've done very well. It's not been a situation where they've played well for one game, where they've played well one season."

"It's been a deal where they've been able to put games back-to-back, seasons back-to-back in terms of playing well, so you know the program has advanced. In order to do that, you have to do a great coaching job. You have to get a lot of people believing in your system — administration, players. They've done that."

That belief was intensified after the Wildcats' 56-10 shellacking of Iowa State last Saturday in Manhattan, Solich said.

"Kansas State, I thought, really did Iowa State in, in all phases of the game, and consequently is playing its best ball, it appears, right now," he said Tuesday.

"If you look at the game this past weekend, they were very, very impressive. As you go through their game tapes of the season, they have shown to be a team that when they're hitting on all cylinders are very dangerous in all phases of the game and can beat anybody in the country. I think they feel that way, and certainly will be playing to try to get that done this coming Saturday."

And the Cats will attempt to get it done, junior free safety Jon McGraw said, and that task comes at an opportune time, as it follows a Cat victory, 56-10 over Iowa State, instead of a loss.

"Anytime you come off a loss, it's hard to recover from that," McGraw said. "I think this was a huge win for us coming into this game, we needed sort of that confidence boost just to get everyone's spirits back up."

And the spirits are high for the K-State/Nebraska contest, despite the fact that the game hasn't received as significant national attention as it has in the past, Solich said.

"This is big for us, without question. It may not be as big for the national media. We probably don't have as many national media coming at the end of our practices, but it is without question in our mind, and I'm sure in Kansas State's mind, a very, very big football game," Solich said.

"This gives one team or the other the upper hand at possibly being able to represent the North in the Big 12 Championship game and of course that's what it's all about. It doesn't get any bigger, when it comes down to that."

Yet the rumor that the media already is predicting a rematch of Nebraska and Oklahoma in the conference title game doesn't aggravate Snyder.

"If that weren't in the media, I'm sure that there would be a lot of people overlooking us, whether it's in the print media or not. Does it bother me? Of course not," Snyder said. "There's a thousand different opinions about whether we're good, not good, lukewarm, cold — whatever it is — and that's what makes the world function. So no, that doesn't concern me."

However, whether Solich will overlook K-State this weekend is a separate story, Snyder said.

"Now, that's a little different agenda, but Frank's not going to do that," he said. "I can assure you that's not the case."

Husker defense back on track after KU win

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

Nebraska's defense has not steam-rolled its opponents this season.

The Huskers have hit a few bumps in the road, but steadily have improved over the course of the season.

The traditionally stingy defense is coming off an impressive showing against KU, where the Huskers kept the Hawks to 266 yards of total offense, Kansas' lowest total since K-State kept them to 231 yards in the fifth week of the 2000 season.

Wildcat offensive tackle John Robertson said he feels the Nebraska defense has continually improved all year and will come into Manhattan playing its best football of the year, especially after surrendering 31 points to Oklahoma on Oct. 28.

"I think the loss to Oklahoma was a wake up call for them," he said. "I think they've really stepped it up a notch since then. They're a tough defense, they're aggressive, they're quick and they play hard, and those are good attributes for any defense."

Robertson said the Cats' offense is not intimidated by the Husker defense, because they have to battle against one of the nation's top defensive unit's every day in practice.

"I'd say they're just another team, another defense," Robertson said. "We go against our 'lynch mob' every day, and we feel like they're a real strong defense. Nebraska has a lot of pride in their defense, and that's good, but we're going to be prepared for them."

The Huskers' pride was bruised early in the season. Nebraska entered the season with a relatively inexperienced secondary, and the Huskers' last line of defense was victimized early in the year by both Iowa State and Missouri.

Sage Rosenfels threw for a career high 346 yards in the Cyclones 49-27 loss to Nebraska and Missouri racked up 311 yards passing in its 42-24 loss.

Since those contests, the secondary has solidified and played well, with the exception of the Huskers game against the Sooners. In that contest, Nebraska allowed 418 total yards, of which 300 came through the air.

Nebraska's defense is ranked 18th in the nation in total defense allowing 301.3 yards per game.

Meanwhile, the team's passing defense is 36th in the nation and the rushing defense ranks 19th overall. The team does give up yards, but only allows 16.9 per game.

The Husker "D" is led by two seniors this year. Middle linebacker Carlos Polk and defensive end Kyle Vanden Bosch have both wreaked havoc on opposing teams' backfields.

Vanden Bosch leads the team with 12 tackles for loss and five sacks.

Senior class set to make final farewell at KSU Stadium

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Four minutes and 30 seconds is the goal when introducing K-State's 26-member senior class Saturday, head coach Bill Snyder said with a grin.

The Nebraska game will mark the final appearance for the seniors at KSU Stadium, a group of individuals Snyder said have a special place in his heart.

"You've got 26 young guys that have been so instrumental in Kansas State football," he said. "You go back and you look at what they've accomplished - it's big. They've put up some tremendous numbers during their time here. By and large, they've been a very successful class.

"I think it's a group of good young people, young guys that have developed an appreciation, I believe, for each other, for Kansas State University, for Manhattan and the fans, and have been a bunch of guys that have been involved in a lot of things off of the field that I think are very, very positive for young people today."

Yet, there's always a potential for a senior class to become unglued in its final home game, Snyder said.

"That's something you always think about, and hope indeed that it doesn't take place. That's something that we address during the course of that final week, whether it happens to be Nebraska or anybody else, in relationship to what might be the best way to deal with it and how to deal with your emotions, he said.

"But by and large, they've been through it before, because they've seen other senior classes go through the same thing, and they've heard the dialogue. But that doesn't mean just because you say, 'Here's the right way to do it,' that that's the way it's going to be dealt with.

Everybody's a little different in that respect and deals with it a little differently. But I do think once the game gets underway, all of that kind of goes by the wayside and you're truly focused on what you're doing."

One of those seniors, quarterback Jonathan Beasley, said emotion will play a factor this weekend in his last outing at KSU Stadium, but it won't affect his performance on the field.

"As long as you play within yourself and do the things you can, you can play with as much emotion as you want," Beasley said.

"It's going to be very special for us, and it's going to be an emotional game, but we can't be too emotional about playing our last game on the field. We have to keep it in between the white lines and let our emotions go from there."

K-State wide receiver Darnell McDonald, 80, is congratulated by teammate Aaron Lockett, back, after catching a touchdown pass in the fourth quarter of K-State's 1998 game against Nebraska. McDonald's 11-yard catch put the Wildcats up 34-30. McDonald caught 12 passes on the day for 183 yards and two touchdowns.

Bishop, the Chevrolet/ABC Player of the Game, became the first player in Big 8/12 history to throw for 300 yards and rush for 100 yards in the same game.

To be exact, the 6-foot, 1-inch, 205-pound QB tallied 306 yards through the air on 19-of-33 passing and 140 yards on the ground in 25 attempts.

But that was 1998. At least that's the way K-State is approaching Saturday's contest between the Wildcats and Cornhuskers, head coach Bill Snyder said, as neither the victory two years ago, nor the Cats' 41-15 loss to NU last season in Lincoln, should affect this weekend's outcome.

"In my approach and the way I would like to view with our players, last year's ball game really has no impact on this one — and really when you get down to it, '98 doesn't either," Snyder said. "Once again, if we believe what we actually preach, then it's all in our preparation and how we manage our business."

Nebraska head coach Frank Solich sees it the very same way.

"That was then, this is now," Solich said of his team's '98 loss in Manhattan. "There's no sense looking back at what happened that year. What matters is how you prepare for the game and what type of game you play and how much intensity you play with."

"There are so many reasons to play with great intensity in this game, and anything that has happened in the past that's been fan-related really doesn't enter into it as far as this football team is concerned."

Yet, the fact K-State has proven they can beat Nebraska counts for something, junior free safety Jon McGraw said.

"I think with anything, once you're able to do it and prove to yourself you can do it, then there's no reason why you can't do it the next time," he said. "I think all the guys that are going to be on the field this Saturday, who were around here in '98, understand that beating Nebraska is a big thing, but it's definitely not impossible."

That task is easier said than done, though, junior linebacker Ben Leber said, as was evident in last season's loss to Nebraska.

"Last year, it was a hard one to take cause we were riding high off of '98, and we felt we could come in there and beat them again, but it's a tough place to play up there, and we didn't play our best," Leber said.

But not all hope is lost for this year, as NU's 26-point win in 1999 didn't shatter K-State's confidence in being able to defeat the Huskers, Robertson said.

"I don't think it really degraded our confidence," he said. "It was disappointing loss — we had hoped to go up to Lincoln and play better than we did — but each year is a new year, and we know winning is within our own grasp."

Yates creates depth at safety

■ 1st-year Wildcat steps in game versus Iowa State to make 2nd career start.

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Derrick Yates' ability to cover receivers is reminiscent of a former Wildcat standout — free safety Lamar Chapman.

At least that's what junior Jon McGraw said of the 6-foot, 2-inch, 185-pound first-year Wildcat.

"I kind of feel like Derrick is more of a cover guy. He sort of reminds me of Lamar Chapman, as far as his ability to cover," McGraw said of the Coffeyville Community College transfer.

However, Yates has yet to prove himself in the same way former co-captain Chapman did in his five-year Wildcat career.

Nevertheless, head coach Bill Snyder said he was impressed with the way his young defensive back performed Saturday against Iowa State in only his second start.

"I thought he played pretty well," Snyder said. "He didn't give up any big plays — he let a couple of catches get made in front of him, but he came up and made the tackle."

Yates is part of a quintet of young defensive backs K-State is counting on to step in, should the team's starters fall to injury, Snyder said.

"There's five guys that if they were the best we have, then they'd be number ones, but they're not," he said. "But they've been productive at what they do, so that gives us some depth."

That depth, Snyder said, is illustrated better in no other place than the secondary, where nine players have seen significant game time action this season.

"I think Derrick has helped us a great deal (DeMarcus) Faggins has helped us a great deal in that respect. And, of course, having Milton Proctor and DeRon Tyler and Terence Newman — all of those guys aren't starters, but they have been able to step in," Snyder said.

After Yates' six-tackle fill-in assignment against the Cyclones, McGraw, the Cats' starting free safety, said his backup showed potential to become an influential part of K-State's defensive package.

"He did a great job," McGraw said. "He really played sound football and made some big plays for us."

Junior linebacker Ben Leber said he agreed, and said Yates' outing was not surprising, but rather indicative of his strong focus and consistent dedication in practice.

"He's a guy that every week just keeps learning and learning and he's taking it very well," Leber said. "He has his nose to the grindstone and is watching film and getting better as every week goes on."

McGraw also said Yates' practice habits have helped him to make the most out of his opportunities this season.

"He works real hard, but he doesn't talk a whole lot," McGraw said. "He practices real hard, and he really focuses on the job that he has to do come Saturday."

With his hard work in practice and effectiveness on gameday, McGraw believes Yates' future in Manhattan looks bright.

"We'll be able to utilize that the remainder of this year and especially next year," he said.

Heisman contender backbone of Husker offense

Nebraska offense more than quarterback game

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

News flash, K-State fans: Eric Crouch is not the only player on Nebraska's offense.

Contrary to popular opinion, the Huskers' offense is not the collegiate version of Bud Bowl, where one gigantic or minuscule player runs up and down the field on the opponent's defense.

There are, in fact, 10 more players who have combined to make Nebraska's Big Red Machine as potent as ever.

To wit: I-back Dan Alexander averages 103 yards per game, and his counterpart, I-back Correll Buckhalter, racks up 74 yards per contest. In fact, Nebraska's three top leading rushers, Alexander, Crouch and Buckhalter, all have gained over 2000 yards for their careers, a first in NCAA history.

In the passing game, tight end Tracey Wistrom doesn't average many yards receiving per game, just 36.9, but when he does make a catch, he can carry it for a long way, as his 52-yard long reception would suggest.

The Huskers are tough offensively, K-State defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"They're very well coached — great quarterback, the offense line — they're fun to watch," he said. "You can just tell that they're coached so well, and they're athletic. It's like they grow them on trees. Every year they lose some, and they replace them with the same type guys."

Wistrom, in particular, can hurt a defense, especially if it's keying too much on Crouch, Snyder said.

"He's a major threat because he has such fine athletic ability. He's a very good athlete, he runs very well and he's got nice hands," he said. "If you just get focused on run, run, run, and you're not looking for the tight end, he's running right by you."

"If he gets a jump on you in that way, then you could be in some trouble because he can run with most defensive secondary people that cover him."

Of course, Iowa State also had a good tight end in Mike Banks. He came into last Saturday's game with the Cats averaging three catches and almost 30 yards receiving per game. Against K-State, however, Banks only managed one catch for seven yards because the Cat defensive ends kept him on the line, Bennett said.

"Last week against Iowa State, they had a really fine tight end, and Monty Beisel and Chris Johnson both completely dominated, which allowed us to do some things that really helped us in the passing game," he said.

While Nebraska's offense certainly is better than Iowa State's, though, the Cats' defense is up to the challenge, Bennett said.

"I think our kids are to the point this year where they'll respond," he said.

■ Snyder impressed with Crouch, searches for defensive strategies.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State fans have no problem remembering the eye-opening plays made by former quarterback Michael Bishop. He was very fast and very talented.

But he was no Eric Crouch, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"That is a fast quarterback. Those of you who are close to our program saw Michael Bishop for quite some time and looked at his speed and quickness and athletic ability, and Eric Crouch runs twice as fast as Michael did," Snyder said of Nebraska's signal caller.

He's so fast and so shifty, in fact, that one wrong move could leave a defender on the ground looking for a security blanket. Crouch is that fast, Snyder said.

"He makes those athletic quick moves, then accelerates, so if you just get a little bit out of position, he makes you look like a fourth-grader," he said. "And he has the ability to throw the football, so you're always worried about the play-action pass."

So how does a team prepare for a running back in quarterback's clothing? Well, it can try to find a scout team player talented enough to simulate that quarterback, and in K-State's case that player is Jeff Schwinn, a redshirt freshman walk-on from McLouth, Kan.

The job is daunting, but so far, Schwinn has done an admirable job, free safety Jon McGraw said.

"If you look at him, he looks just like Crouch in the way he runs. He does a great job of running scout team offense against us," McGraw said. "Ever since two years ago when he first got here, we've always called him Mini-Crouch. He looks just like him and really does a nice job of running the option."

Unfortunately for K-State, however, no player can fully replicate Crouch's ability, and if one could, he wouldn't be on the scout team.

"You don't simulate Eric Crouch, at least not very well," Snyder said. "If we had an Eric

Eric Crouch flips an option to his running back as he is dragged to the ground by K-State's Monty Beisel in the first half of last season's game in Lincoln. The Huskers won the contest 41-15.

Crouch here, he would be up with the offense most of the time."

Ironically, though, the first step in stopping Nebraska's bread-and-butter play, the triple option, is not collapsing on the quarterback. The fullback actually takes first priority, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

"I'm a believer that in the option, you've got to stop the fullback first," he said. "I'm a believer when you defend option, you'd better defend it from the inside out."

Still, K-State will focus plenty of attention and manpower on meeting No. 7 at the line of scrimmage, but, as he has in every game this year, Crouch eventually will break free, Bennett said.

"Without a doubt, you look at the numbers, and Crouch is a guy that you've got to account for at every minute on every play. You've got to contain him," Bennett said. "He's going to make some plays, but you can't let them to be difference-making plays."

Stopping Crouch will require a total-team effort on the part of the Cats. Nebraska's options are designed to isolate different defensive players at different times, so almost every K-State defender will have a shot at bringing down Crouch.

"That's the most difficult thing is that it changes each play. Depending on the option that they throw at us, it could be the defensive end, it could be a linebacker, it could be a safety," McGraw said, "and so that's what makes it so different is that every play, every option, the responsibilities change."

"You've got to be assignment sound. You've got to know who's on the quarterback every play, on the pitch, on the reads, everything they run."

Therein lies the challenge. Someone must account for Crouch on every play or the team will pay the consequences, McGraw said.

"You've got to know who's supposed to be there," he said, "and if it's your job then you've got to be there, or else he's going to kill you."

Leber leads Cats through physical, mental toughness

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

Tailback Josh Scobey said he's just thankful Ben Leber wears purple as opposed to another Big 12 color.

"He's a great tackler, and I think he has a great instinct for where the ball is," Scobey said. "He's one of the best linebackers in this conference."

In fact, Leber helps strengthen K-State's offense, Scobey said, an offense that has consistently ranked as one of the top scoring offenses in the nation.

"We face him every day, and we look at it as getting better as an offensive unit," he said.

Leber leads the Wildcat linebacking corps in tackles this season with 45, which is fourth on the team, including 11 tackles for loss and 2.5 sacks through 10 games.

Yet, aside from the statistical breakdown, Scobey said Leber's biggest attributes lie in his leadership qualities and his ability to get the Cats mentally prepared to play on Saturdays.

"I think he's been the vocal leader and also been a leader on the field," Scobey said. "He came up really big a couple of weeks ago against Texas Tech, and I think he's fighting every week — he's bettering himself every week."

Head coach Bill Snyder said he agreed that Leber has been an instrumental part of the Cat defensive unit this season.

"I think Ben is playing well. I think the Texas Tech game, the Oklahoma game — he really kind of came into his own," Snyder said.

Leber has endured through a position switch at the beginning of the 2000 season, as he moved from his middle linebacker position to the strong side.

Nevertheless, with that switch came the privilege of being selected as a team captain for the 2000 season — while just a junior.

"It was very shocking that I actually got nominated, and I'm grateful for all the guys that voted for me," Leber said. "I always just hoped I'd never let them down and always be there for them, if they need anything. I take a lot of pride in it — it's something that anybody should take pride in."

Senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley, one of Leber's fellow captains, said the 6-foot, 4-inch, 250 pound linebacker was a natural choice to represent K-State football.

"He's got great leadership," Beasley said. "Just the way he presents himself around the community and the team — all the players like him. He just goes out there and plays his game, plays within himself and does what's asked of him."

But there's always room for improvement, Leber said.

"What motivates me is trying to improve, trying to go out there each and every game and improve on the little things that I've set aside for me to improve on," he said. "and knowing if I do those things, I can help our team win."

Winning has been a trend for Leber, as K-State has compiled a 41-6 record since he arrived in Manhattan for his redshirt season in 1997.

That winning was just a small part of the Vermillion, S.D., native's decision to play football for K-State.

"It was the environment and the community — it was like home as far as the way the people treated you," Leber said. "Everybody was friendly, everybody was nice and willing to lend a hand — and with a great program like this, it was an easy decision for me."

That decision has paid off for the Wildcats. Leber was named Ben Leber pressures Colorado quarterback Travis Ochs earlier in the season when the Wildcats traveled to Boulder, Colo.

Collegian

Honorable Mention All-Big 12 by the league's coaches last season, and already was tabbed in 2000 as one of 70 linebackers across the nation getting consideration for the Dick Butkus Award, which is given to the best collegiate linebacker.

Yet, despite all the acclaim he's received, Leber said he's not sure if he can identify a signature about his approach to playing the game of football.

"I really don't do anything special before the game — I don't do anything different before the game," he said. "I guess Thursday night, Carlos O' Kelly's night with the guys, is always something to look forward to, and once that night hits, we get some candy at Mr. Bulky's and we're ready to go."

Olathe native preparing for leadership role on 2001 offensive line

By DAN SMITH

Kansas State Collegian

One of left guard Andy Eby's favorite post-game activities is going hunting with his good friend John Robertson. The two have shared a common bond since their days at Olathe East High School.

"I think it's good because all we do while we're sitting in that duck blind is talk about the game," said Eby, junior in construction science management. "We talk about how we did, blocks we made, blocks we didn't make. It's a fun time."

This season, Eby and his line mates have played well, head coach Bill Snyder said, allowing only three sacks in 322 pass attempts and blocking for a Wildcat running attack that has compiled 37 rushing touchdowns this season.

"I've been relatively pleased so far," Snyder said of his o-line. "They've shown some balance in their ability to, from time to time, run the ball with some effectiveness, so they're getting better, they're improving as we go."

A valuable part of the Cats' blocking schemes, Eby went down with an injury earlier this year against intrastate rival Kansas and missed the team's next two games against Oklahoma and Texas Tech.

That, Snyder said, is when Eby impressed him the most as a person, one who has the potential to lead a Wildcat line that will lose three seniors next year in center Randall Cummins, left tackle Milford Stephenson and tight end Shad Meier.

"When he got hurt, I was impressed by his attitude towards his rehabilitation in attempting to get back as quickly as he could," Snyder said, "and from that, I think, stemmed a foundation for some quality leadership from him."

During Eby's absence, however, Robertson stepped up his game, earning offensive player of the week honors for his performance against Oklahoma in a tough loss, an honor that Eby jokingly said he should have gotten.

"I told him he was lucky that I wasn't in there," Eby said, "but seriously, I'm happy that John played well and got that honor."

Snyder will no doubt look towards Eby and Robertson next year, as the offensive line will be anchored by the two Olathe, Kan., natives, something Eby said he accepts.

"We talk about playing like a leader, like being accountable for how you play and how you practice," Eby said. "The best leaders on the team aren't necessarily the guys who talk the most, it's the guys who go out and practice hard every day, and you can just look at their actions and you can tell that they are a leader out there."

Robertson said he thinks their leadership needs to be established this year so the team's younger players will follow their lead.

"We basically need to gain respect of our teammates and continue to play hard, and I think people may see he and I pushing each other to play harder — that can have an affect that motivates other players," Robertson said.

Although Robertson picked K-State first and Eby said he picked the Cats for his own reasons, both of the former Hawks said the other had something to do with their selection.

"We both looked at other schools and made our own decisions, but of course we talked about it," Robertson said. "It kind of worked out that way that it's close to home and our families are good friends. It was a good decision for both of us I think."

Eby said he agreed. "I made the decision based on what I wanted to do, but it helped to have John there," Eby said. "I was real excited to have him here — we've had a good time since we've been here."

Allen set to break NCAA punt return record against NU

Expect a historic weekend when Nebraska comes to town this Saturday.

No, I'm not talking about K-State attaining just its second win over the Huskers since 1968. Though that lingers as a definite possibility, the record will crash at the hands of a single Wildcat.

His name? David Allen. Watch for Allen to shatter the NCAA career punt return record of 1,695 yards, held by Lee Nalley of Vanderbilt for more than half a century. Now that's history.

But in all reality, Allen only needs a mere 67 punt return yards this weekend to etch his name at the top of the list — that can't be too hard, can it? But remember, it is Nebraska we're talking about.

Yet, my cocky nature and stubbornness to overlook such "minor details" once again is evident in my prediction this week.

Allen not only will break the punt return record against the Huskers, but his returns will determine the outcome of the ball game.

OK, OK, before I get ahead of myself, let me explain. As most of you would agree, special teams play has had an enormous, colossal, gargantuan, (insert word of choice) effect on K-State football in the past. Husker head coach Frank Solich could tell you that.

"I think the one thing that has helped Kansas State over the years has been outstanding special teams play," Solich said Tuesday via teleconference. "They have been a team that has been able to win that phase of the game against almost everybody they play. It's been that way now, for several years, so you want to make sure you're ready to do things very well in the special teams part of the game."

And Saturday will prove no different. Nevertheless, the only person that can legitimately put a stop to Allen's record-breaking attempt and his game-changing returns will be one particular Husker wearing No. 17.

NU punter Dan Hadenfeldt might have the school record for longest average in a season (44.98 in '99), but his ability to directional punt will be tested this weekend.

Certainly don't expect Nebraska's strategy in kicking the ball to Allen to be any different, especially looking at the way the Huskers' kicked away from No. 32 in '99. Even head coach Bill Snyder knows it.

"Well, they did it against us last year," Snyder said. "That's not the first time I've seen them directional kick, but it was the first time that they made that real concentrated effort to keep the ball away from David Allen."

That's exactly what NU's planning to do this year as well.

So what are the Cats to do? With another great returner in Aaron Lockett, should K-State put two men deep in NU punting situations? That question remains to be seen. I don't have the answers — if I did, I wouldn't be writing a column in the Collegian about it.

At any rate, though, Allen and the Cats will try to achieve it all in the comfort of their home field this weekend — a definite advantage as opposed to the tumult and bedlam of Memorial Stadium in Lincoln. Just ask Snyder.

"Well, I don't have to sit on that bus for two hours. I've never been good at riding buses, so that's an advantage," the Cat coach jokingly said. "The obvious advantages are that you're playing at home, and you're acclimated to what goes on and you've got more of your fans — we can only get 4,000 of them up there and here hopefully we have whatever our share will be, 50,000, and I hope that's the case."

We certainly hope that occurs Saturday, as the Cats might need a little help in order to part the Red Sea once more.

Beasley's inefficiency in big games proves detrimental to K-State

The Huskers and Wildcats stand toe to toe, staring at each other, and it's like looking in the mirror.

Not a pretty sight, either: the image is one of fat, cartoonish Lil' Red mating with the ridiculous Powercat to produce a bastard offspring that both stands on his head and uses his arms to expertly spell out the letters, "K," "S," and "U."

Power Red. Lil' Cat. A creation from mascot hell.

The similarities are so many and varied that it's hard to imagine Saturday's game being anything but close (although not necessarily well-played).

Both teams are chock full of talent. They have more than anyone else in the nation save Florida State. Both teams have underachieved this season. Both were beaten by an Oklahoma team that had no business beating them. The Sooners just wanted it more.

Both teams have spectacular field generals, Eric Crouch, Michael Bish ... oh.

It's not Bishop, but a pawn named Jonathan Beasley that leads these Wildcats. He interrupts the utter duplicity of the CornCats, the Wildskers. Saturday, he will be the difference, a negative difference, for K-State.

Nebraska will not win this game so much as Beasley will get knocked down by another round of big-game football. Beasley, meet canvas yet again. This time, neither ice nor the Missouri Tigers will make the bruises disappear.

All this big-game pummeling started with Nebraska last season, when Beasley scattered 16 incomplete passes across the Memorial Stadium turf.

Of course, to hear K-State coaches and Beasley tell it this week, his shoulder was horribly separated.

Not buying it. Yes, there's no doubt that Beasley was banged up. If he'd been seriously injured, though, why didn't capable backup Adam Helm start?

The results weren't much better when Beasley's shoulder was all better. In the Wildcats' loss to Oklahoma this season, it was 22 incomplete passes and two interceptions.

More? Twenty-five incomplete passes and two picks in a loss to A&M. Joe Montana he ain't.

Let's not forget the games that K-State unexpectedly struggled in with Beasley at the helm. In close wins over Iowa State last season and Texas Tech this season, Beasley threw for a whopping 184 yards combined. The opinion behind all these numbers is that Beasley can't do it when the bright lights are on. His stats are padded beyond belief by easy wins over mediocre Big 12 teams and non-conference doormats.

But, come game time — real game time — Beasley won't show up. Crouch will. Nebraska by two touchdowns.

Otherwise, these teams might play forever.

Freshman makes mark in Wildcat linebacking corps

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

Freshman linebacker Terry Pierce is making the most of his opportunities this season and is quickly becoming a playmaker for the Wildcats.

Just ask fellow linebacker Ben Leber.

"Terry brings a lot to the team," he said. "He's big, he's real big, and he's very strong, and most importantly, he's extremely smart. I've never seen a linebacker so young have a grasp of the defense as a whole."

"He knows not only what he's doing but a lot about what the other linebackers, the secondary and the d-line are doing. He's got a very good grasp of the game and he just keeps getting better."

Pierce has played in nine games this season, recording 24 tackles, five for loss. During the Iowa State game, Pierce showed his big play ability as he recovered a fumble and intercepted a pass in the end zone.

"I always want to be a big play guy," Pierce said. "In high school I was always a big play guy, and whenever it boils down to it, and third down comes, I want my team to say, 'Hey, we got somebody here who can make plays for us.'"

Dyshod Carter celebrates with Terry Pierce after he intercepted a pass in the end zone during last Saturday's game against Iowa State.

Pierce won the Overachiever Award last season for work done with strength and conditioning while redshirting, and at 6-foot, 3-inches and 245 pounds, he's an impressive physical specimen.

Leber said Pierce's size is an advantage, but it's Pierce's intellect that allows him to make plays.

"Being where you're suppose to be is key in making plays, and he knows where he's suppose to be. He knows the defense in and out, and he knows what the other team is trying to do," Leber said. "When you got that and all his physical tools, yeah, he's going to make plays."

Pierce made plays all through high school, and was highly touted coming out of Western Hills High School in Fort Worth, Texas. He was offered scholarships to Texas, Texas Tech and Baylor, but said his grandmother and K-State's success in 1997 and 1998 played key factors in his decision to play for the Wildcats.

"My grandmother really wanted me to leave Texas — she didn't want me to go too far, but she wanted me to leave," he said. "She didn't want me coming home all the time. Together, we came up with the idea that Kansas State would be the right place."

"It was mostly the atmosphere when I came here. Where I'm from back in Texas, we don't really talk too much about Kansas State, and when I came up here, I didn't really want to come up here at first. But when I came up here it was like the perfect spot, with the football team and that the town pretty much revolves around what the football team does."

Since he arrived in Manhattan, Pierce has impressed his coaches and has continued to improve, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"Terry has made consistent progress throughout the course of the season, and I think the more he's on the field, the better he gets, and that's the way you'd hope for it to be with any youngster," Snyder said.

"I think we've known Terry to be an athletic player and a physical player since his enrollment here."

"What we have tried to do is develop him over a period of time that would allow him to have a very strong understanding of what we do so that he can play relatively mistake-free, and have the confidence to utilize the talents that he does have and the strengths that he has without having to think too much on the field. So it's a matter of becoming acclimated to our system as much as anything."

Pierce has had some talented players help him acclimate to K-State as well. He said former Wildcat linebacker Mark Simoneau and current teammates Turelle

Williams and Leber have been instrumental in his success.

"Simoneau helped me. He didn't really talk a whole lot, but just watching him play helped me a lot," Pierce said. "And Ben started at the middle linebacker position, the position I'm playing now, last year, so he's been able to help me with a lot of little questions I've had about the defense and why we're doing certain things."

"Just having Turelle here has helped, too. He's been here for five years and just his experience has helped me because he's played against Nebraska and Oklahoma and all them. Just having all them around has helped a lot."

As a result, Pierce has had an effect on his teammates. Leber said he and Pierce help each other elevate their play each week.

"It's kind of funny because I feel he's been tutoring me more than I've been tutoring him," Leber said. "He's very observant. He understands the game so much. We just kind of feed off each other. If he's asking questions about something, I'll tell him, 'here's what we did last year,' and he's been doing the same for me."

year when they face the Huskers, and Snyder will attest to that.

"The only years that I can recall that Nebraska might not have been in contention to become the national champion were the early years we were here and Colorado played in a couple national championship games," he said.

Junior left guard Andy Eby even compared the Cat/Husker matchup to a regular-season bowl game.

"This one's playing for the Big 12 Championship game, and this is definitely just like a bowl game," he said. "Everybody's going to be up for it. There's going to be a lot of hype, and there's going to be a lot of emotion into this game."

However, this season's matchup has a little different flavor to it compared to 1998, as the Wildcats aren't boasting an undefeated record or a top-2 ranking.

Nevertheless, K-State losses to Oklahoma and Texas A&M this year don't necessarily make the Cats more relaxed heading into this weekend, Snyder said.

"That's certainly a possibility, but will that be the case? I couldn't tell you right now," he said.

But Eby has an answer, an emphatic "no."

"I don't think you can play loose against this team," he said. "We just have to have a lot of emotion, have a lot of intensity, have a lot of excitement and just execute with all that going with us."

That challenge of executing against a team like Nebraska is something Snyder enjoys, though.

"Probably every ball game we've played against them, they've had a little wrinkle in what they have done," Snyder said. "You try to project what that can be, but very seldom do you hit it on the head. But by and large, 95 percent of what they do is what they do. Their deal is, they just do it so well."

And K-State will have to match that Saturday, but free safety Jon McGraw said he isn't worried that the Cats will be up for the game. The junior said he knew it was 'Nebraska week' right away from the team's Monday practice alone, following the Cats' 56-10 victory over Iowa State last Saturday.

"It was probably one of the most intense practices we've had this year. I think everybody's in high spirits because of last week and the way we came out and performed, and I think things are beginning to click a lot more than they were the previous few weeks," he said.

"That's going to be crucial for us this week — we've got to be clicking on all cylinders, we've got to have all facets of our game rolling."

"If you're going to beat Nebraska, that's the way it's got to be."

The Red Sea parted once more. For the second time in the past three seasons, K-State did what was once the unthinkable — beat Nebraska.

On Senior Day, amid a snow-covered field at KSU Stadium, the No. 16/11 Wildcats (9-2, 5-2) topped the No. 4/5 Cornhuskers (8-2, 5-2) Saturday, 29-28.

"It was just absolutely amazing. I really don't even know how to express it, because it means so much to go out like this on your home field," senior Brice Libel said. "And the weather — the weather was just beautiful — it was so fitting."

Like the Cats' 40-30 win over Nebraska in 1998, the goal posts came down — or the right upright at least.

As the waning seconds ticked off the clock, the record crowd of 53,811 rushed the field to join the players in celebration, while managing to take a piece of the north goal post with them to Aggieville.

Apparently, they were trying to take senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper along as well.

"They were picking me up, and I was like, 'all right, you're going to make me slip and fall and I'm going to get hurt, and there goes the rest of my life,'" Cooper said.

But undoubtedly, the win was a big one for the senior class, as defensive end Monty Beisel was quick to attest.

Inside:

See more football coverage on pages 7, 8, 10 and 12.

"Beating them two out of the last three years is huge. It's a big feather in the cap for the seniors," he said. "The last home game of your senior season, and there's no better way to go out."

"One point over Nebraska, and the fans rushing the field, it's just crazy. It's something that's going to be cherished for a lifetime, and it's something we'll definitely look back on."

Even more special was the fact that the Huskers were favored by four to defeat the Cats, junior linebacker Ben Leber said.

"With everybody counting us down and out, it was even sweeter. I loved to see in the newspaper that we were predicted to lose, and a lot of people are picking us to lose — that's what I wanted, I wanted to be the underdog," he said.

"I wanted to show everybody that we could overcome adversity and conditions like this. It made it just that much sweeter."

Sweet it was, Cooper said, as the victory ranks as one of the most memorable of his career.

"It was pretty emotional. I loved it — every last second," he said Saturday. "From the minute I woke up this morning at 6:32 to Monday at five o'clock, it's going to be great — probably one of the most special moments in the history of my game."

But that's not to say K-State's football program has finally climbed the mountain against Nebraska. The Cats did that two years ago in Manhattan, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"We've been here before. We've done this before," he said.

Goal post makes repeat visit to Aggieville post-game party

K-State fans celebrated Saturday's win over Nebraska much like they did two years ago — fans rushed the field, tore at the goal post, marched through Aggieville and placed a portion of the post on top of Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

But this time, only one upright from the post remains on Chance's roof, and spectators said the mob of excited fans was much calmer.

Florida promises recount tabulations by week's end

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

The legal skirmishing quickened in the overtime race for the White House as Al Gore's lawyers argued Sunday night that painstaking election recounts have been allowed "since our nation's founding."

Republicans said the practice exposes decisive Florida to political "mischief" and human error in Democratic-controlled counties.

Updated voting figures in Florida gave Republican George W. Bush a 288-vote margin out of some 6 million votes cast with recounts under way in four counties. The vice president leads in the nationwide popular vote, but the Electoral College tally is so close that whoever takes Florida almost certainly will win the White House.

Both parties previewed their legal strategies for a federal court hearing today on Bush's request to block manual recounts. Top Bush adviser James A.

Baker III, who described the five-day Florida standoff as "a black mark on our democracy and on our process," said the GOP legal team will argue that manual recounts in only four of Florida's 67 counties would constitute unequal treatment under the 14th Amendment.

Baker said Florida has no uniform standard for reviewing the ballots, and suggested that Democrats who control the contested counties would play favorites. "It's all subjective, and therefore it presents terrible problems of human error and potential for mischief," Baker said. A statewide machine-operated recount has already narrowed Bush's lead.

Baker's rival, Gore consigliere Warren Christopher, portrayed vote recounts as a routine necessity of democracy.

"If at the end of the day, George Bush has more votes in Florida than we do, certainly the vice president will concede," Christopher said, even while leaving open the prospect of court action if recounting ends with Bush still ahead.

Democrats filed court papers Sunday night on behalf of Gore arguing that Florida's manual ballot law is constitutional. Led by Harvard University law professor Laurence Tribe, party lawyers also said Bush's complaints threatens Florida's right to run its own elections.

Bush is arguing against a system that "reflects an electoral practice — the Collegian, Royal Purple receive special honors

The Kansas State Collegian and the Royal Purple Yearbook won the nation's highest awards for collegiate journalism this weekend.

The Pacemaker Award, considered the Pulitzer Prize of collegiate journalism, was awarded to the 1999-2000 Collegian and the 1999 Royal Purple — the RP's 13th consecutive time to win the award. It honors the top-six yearbooks and the top-six newspapers in the nation.

K-State was a finalist in all eligible categories — yearbook, yearbook compact disc, newspaper and online newspaper — and was the only university to do so.

Both publications were also awarded for Best of Show Awards honoring current publications.

The 2000 RP won second place, and the fall edition of the Collegian received third place.

Last Wednesday's edition, with the Collegian's own election coverage from Austin, Texas, and Nashville, Tenn., was the winning entry for the Collegian.

Newspapers were judged by journalists from the Washington Post, and yearbooks were judged by an independent panel organized by the Associated Collegiate Press.

Individual awards were given to six members of both publications.

Steven Dearing, 2000 RP photography editor, was awarded second place for feature photojournalism and Justin Hayworth, senior in print journalism, was awarded third. Evan Semon, sophomore in mass communications, received an honorable mention in news photojournalism.

Rachel Powers, 1999-2000 RP editor in chief, Wendy Schantz, 1999-2000 RP assistant editor and Geoff Peggs, design editor, won second place in the yearbook feature-design competition.

Hairy Apes BMX, Clever and a local band, Flybox, are opening for headliner 2 Skinnee Js tonight at Silverado.

Brandon Noone, drummer for Flybox, said the band, whose hits include "The Mask," "Pulling Together" and "Big Shots," is ready to perform.

Noone said the group's sound is combination of the bands Incubus, The Urge and Rage Against the Machine.

"We call it fusion funk," he said. "We have influences of hip-hop, reggae and funk."

There are several reasons why people should come out for the show, Noone said. There will be national and local talent performing, all with distinct styles.

He said the largest reason people should want to help promote bands is to keep a variety of music performances in the Little Apple, as well as for people to support their music.

"People are starting to recognize Manhattan as a town with decent bands," he said.

The doors open at 8 p.m. Tickets are $12 in advance and $15 at the door. They are available at Streetside Records in Aggieville and all Ticketmaster outlets.

Board of Regents will evaluate community college fund usage

By JENNIFER O'NEILL
Kansas State Collegian

A decision that could result in a significant change in the way state community colleges fund scholarships will be on the Kansas Board of Regents agenda this month.

A member of the Dodge City Community College Board of Trustees has questioned whether or not the community college in Ford County, as well as others, have been in violation of a state law regarding scholarship funding for more than 30 years.

The present law, K.S.A. 71-203, enacted in 1968, prohibits the use of public money to be used to fund scholarships for any student who isn't a resident of the community college district.

The law also states that "no public funds shall be expended for athletic scholarships either within or without any community college district and athletic scholarships shall not be granted to nonresidents of the state of Kansas."

Also in that section it states, "money received from sale of admissions to activities which the community college sponsors shall not be deemed to be public funds."

Terry J. Malone, board trustee at Dodge City Community College, said most of the 19 community colleges in Kansas have violated this statute.

"Even though the law has existed for 32 years, it's been ignored by community colleges because they can't figure out any other way to fund athletic scholarships but to force other students to pay for it," he said.

He said community colleges, with the exception of Johnson County, all charge fees without authorization, and the fees are public money.

At Dodge City Community College, the tuition is $32 per credit hour for a Kansas resident, and the incidental fee or "scholarship tax" is $14 per credit hour.

Malone said this scholarship tax represents 30 percent of the per-credit-hour cost of attending the community college.

"Virtually all of that money, around $500,000, is used to fund scholarships for students who reside outside Ford County," he said. "So we're taking from one student's pocket and placing the money in another student's pocket."

He said community colleges have made it more expensive to attend for everyone in order to make it less expensive for a few.

"If a student refuses to pay that tax, then they're denied admission to a publicly owned educational institution," Malone said. "I don't believe that makes any sense whatsoever."

Not everyone involved in this matter agrees with Malone. Since the issue is questionable, his opinion led to the Kansas Association of Community College Trustees undergoing a procedure to interpret what the 1968 law actually prohibits.

Floris Jean Hampton, member of the Board of Regents, said she doesn't take the same stance.

"I haven't felt we've made a mistake," she said. "The same thing was checked 15 years ago, and at the time they were in compliance with the law."

In response to this controversial issue, the KACCT will propose recommendations to the law to the regents.

The proposed law would remove the statement that prohibits the granting of athletic scholarships to out-of-state students. It also includes changes about how public funds shouldn't be spent for athletic scholarships within or without a community college district and that money received from admissions to activities that the community college sponsors, student fees and money received from private persons or organization shouldn't be deemed public funds.

With the approval of the regents, the recommendations will be presented to the Kansas Legislature.

"It's absurd public policy," Malone said. "Instead of acknowledging the mistakes and go back to abiding what the law says, we're changing it to make ourselves right."

He said the money paid from tuition needs to go to improving building conditions, faculty salaries and other expenses.

Terry Williams, chairman of the Dodge City Community College board of trustees, says he and the board are in favor of the procedure that will clarify the law.

As far as his feelings on the alleged violation, he says it's a hard call.

"I feel that when they wrote the law they left it hanging," he said. "I do believe it means that out-of-state scholarships can be given by booster clubs — not by tax payers."

He said he agrees with Malone that perhaps more money does need to go to other expenses of the community colleges, but doesn't think that the money is coming from other students.

Williams said it's good that they're looking to update the law.

"The whole system of community colleges has changed in the last 30 years, so I think this is positive," he said.

Hampton agrees, but said it's unfortunate that an individual is raising questions detrimental to the unity of an organization.

Malone said students should only have to worry about paying their own educational expenses and not someone else's, especially if that other student is more financially stable.

"If the Board of Regents support this change in the law," he said. "It's just a matter of time before the same thing will be forced on the students who attend regent institutions."

Nisha Nair, graduate student in industrial engineering, talks about an article of clothing with Karen Hines at the International Student Center warm clothing sale on Sunday afternoon. The sale provided students an opportunity to get warm clothes at a reduced price.

WINTER warmth

International center puts on clothing sale

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Saturday's snowfall led Nisha Nair, a student from India, to search for clothing suitable for a Kansas winter.

The annual clothing sale Sunday at the International Student Center offered winter clothing to Nair and other international students who aren't familiar with cold Kansas winters.

"I saw my first snow on Saturday. In India it never gets below zero," said Nair, graduate student in industrial engineering. "I'm used to wearing just sweaters, and now I need more jackets."

The sale was sponsored by the Manhattan Rotary Club, Konza Rotary Club and the K-State Rotoract Club. Proceeds from the sale will benefit the International Student Center. Leftover clothing will be donated to the Salvation Army or emergency shelters.

Rachel Fleischacker, Rotoract Club president, said the clubs donated a wider variety of clothing this year, and there was a larger turnout compared to past years.

"We said it started at 3, and at 2:30 there were lots of families and graduate students here ready to go," Fleischacker said. "I think Saturday's weather was a shock for some of them. A lot of students aren't prepared for this weather."

Jagat Shakya, who is from Nepal, said he's not used to the extremes of seasons in Manhattan.

"Here the summers are so hot, and the winters are so cold. In Nepal, I could wear one type of clothing for six or seven months straight," Shakya, graduate student in physics, said.

Arun Manandhar, who is also from Nepal, said he needs more coats and boots for the colder weather.

"In Nepal, it only snows in the mountains," Manandhar, graduate student in business administration, said.

"When I walk to class in the mornings here, it's much colder than back home."

Rotoract Club secretary Mollie Dvorak said the sale's large turnout made her more aware of the international students' needs.

"When all the kids were running around and people found clothes they were excited about, I realized how much they depend on the inexpensive things we're selling," Dvorak said.

Fans showed support, need to stay fired up

Saturday's football game against Nebraska showed K-State fans the kind of potential that this year's Wildcats have.

Perhaps more than that, however, the 29-28 win demonstrated to players and coaches the kind of support and dedication that thousands of purple-clad fans can show in the midst of one of the most important games in the school's history. This year's team worked hard for 60 minutes, putting on a great show for the record crowd. In turn, Wildcat students, alumni, and fans stayed for the entire game — and then some.

For the second time in three years against Nebraska, K-State proved that Manhattan is home to the nation's greatest fans, those dressed in purple and white.

After the game, a good part of the 53,811 fans rushed the field in support of their team's impressive comeback win.

Saturday's win over the Huskers was also evidence of the team's "never-say-die" attitude toward the season, by its impressive winning drive in the game's final minutes.

K-State should beat Missouri next week. Watch the game with pride and cheer the Cats wildly, and then punch your tickets for a return trip to Kansas City, Mo.

Paint it purple, Wildcat fans, and then show the same kind of support for the Cats against Oklahoma in the Big 12 Championship as you did against Nebraska.

UNALTERABLE events

Recount will not alter results obtained in Tuesday voting

On the heels of the most contentious election in our history, Americans are bombarded with rhetoric and fast-talking. What we want is a solution. What we want is a president.

As the election process drags out into what looks to be more than a week, voters in Florida are disenfranchised, according to some of the Democratic spinmeisters: Democratic activists, representatives and members of Congress. To be disenfranchised, according to the Merriam Webster dictionary, is to be deprived of a franchise, of a legal right or of some privilege or immunity, especially: to deprive of the right to vote. I would argue that we are creating a nation of voters who are not disenfranchised but disenfranchised.

The voters in Florida were not, in any way, denied their right to vote. They were provided a clear ballot, with clear choices. They were given the opportunity to change their votes in the event that they improperly voted for the wrong person.

Democrats suggest that the ballot was faulty because of the 19,000 of ballots that were double punched and therefore disqualified. It has been proven that up to 80 percent of those voters received a new ballot at the time they incorrectly voted, and they were allowed to re-vote. Incidentally, in the 1996 election there were between 14,000 and 15,000 ballots that were disqualified for the very same reason. What about the 95 percent of Palm Beach voters who were able to correctly place their votes?

Democrats also question the large number of votes received by Pat Buchanan. Buchanan pulled in 3,400 votes in this election. What people fail to realize is that in 1996 he received 8,000 votes in a primary election in the same county. This is a county where a relative of Buchanan lives and campaigns for him. This is a county where a successful drive to attract new members to the Reform Party occurred. Five percent of Buchanan's Florida statewide fund raising came from Palm Beach county.

A Democratic supervisor of elections designed the now-famous Palm Beach butterfly ballot, the central issue in the Florida election question. It was given to both Democrats and Republicans to sign off on. It was approved by the Florida secretary of state. Both the Gore and Bush camps were provided copies of the ballots. The ballots were published in the local newspapers and copies were sent to registered voters before Election Day. At no time prior to elections were questions regarding the legality of the ballot questioned.

This is a ballot used around the country, including Cook County, Ill., a Democratic precinct, without incident. It has been used before in Florida elections. Furthermore, I have yet to hear about any confusion concerning other options on that same ballot. Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., said, "A ballot shouldn't be a puzzle. A ballot shouldn't be a maze."

According to a Georgia psychologist who imitated the butterfly ballot format by substituting Disney characters for presidential candidates, the ballot was clear. This psychologist gave his ballot to second graders and asked them to vote for their favorite Disney character. When later surveyed, 100 percent of the second graders chose the Disney character they intended to choose.

Does the responsibility to vote rest on the voter's shoulders? We are all granted the right to vote. It is the voter's obligation to make sure that we get to the polls, or cast an absentee ballot. It is the voter's burden to educate himself or herself on the issues and candidates.

It is the voter's responsibility to see that we cast our ballots the way we intend them to read.

The night of the election, some reports say, the Democrats, with the use of a telemarketing firm, started a calling blitz in the area of Palm Beach asking voters whether or not they were confused by the butterfly ballot. What sparks mob rule more than being incited by the thought that some might be denied? Everyone wants to make sure that the elderly and under-represented groups are heard.

Now there are demonstrations and sit-ins. People are demanding a revote. A revote will never work. It will not paint a true picture of what should have happened on Tuesday. Instead, a revote will only show that voters who chose Ralph Nader hoping that the Green Party would receive the 5-percent nationwide vote in order to gain federal campaign funding will change their votes to Gore. This also would result in 100 percent voter turn-out in Palm Beach, which isn't what happened on Tuesday, the day for national elections.

It is time that our politicians act with dignity and respect, putting our nation first. It is time we name a president according to the vote as was taken on Tuesday. Then we can handle the election crisis and the inconsistencies and make sure this never happens again. You can't change the rules in the middle of the game, and you can't vote and revote until you get the answers some are hoping for.

Reasonable solution must be found to solve campus parking problems

Most of us have had our run-ins with the infamous employees of K-State Parking Services. Whether it be a parking ticket or a wheel lock, they frustrate all of us in these times of too many cars and few parking spaces. They seem to be everywhere at once and never miss an illegally parked car, even if you're only going to be there for a short amount of time. They are much like a pack of vultures as they wait, ready to descend on an illegally-parked car as if it were a dead carcass.

My frustration with parking services stems from a personal experience I had. It all began at 10 a.m. on Nov. 1 when the phone rang. I answered and was surprised to hear Parking Services on the other line informing me that my car had received a wheel lock and I had to pay for it by the end of the day or suffer the consequence of having my car towed. I was completely aware that all the five unpaid parking fines and the wheel lock were entirely my fault, so I resolved to get to Edwards Hall to pay as soon as possible.

I arrived at Parking Services later that day to pay my fines and was informed that my car had already been towed, and I would have to travel to Manhattan Wrecker where I would have to pay $70 to retrieve my car. Needless to say, I was slightly upset, but I didn't want to start an argument with the poor girl behind the desk, as she had nothing to do with it.

While in the process of writing my check for my parking fines, the attendant informed that my car was towed at 10 a.m. that morning, the same time I received the phone call informing me of the wheel lock. Is this standard procedure to call someone to tell them that their car could be towed at the very moment that a tow truck is driving away with the vehicle in tow? Am I the only one who thinks this is absolutely ridiculous?

I e-mailed Parking Services with my concerns and my experience, hoping that something would be done.

On Nov. 6, I received another phone call from Parking Services, this time from Darwin Abbott, director of parking services. He told me that parking services would no longer be calling people at all to inform them that their cars could be towed. Apparently, I was not the only one who had been through this. I was refunded the $70 it cost for the tow charges. (See, whining can get you somewhere.) But the fact remains: parking on campus is a nightmare.

I think everyone can acknowledge that parking is a serious problem on campus and the addition of a temporary parking lot on the far side of campus isn't going to solve it. Nor will a shuttle service costing students $23 per year solve the problem. A serious parking solution needs to be addressed now, taking the future into consideration, a plan that will take into account the rising student population every year.

What K-State needs is a parking garage, or two or three. A university this size should have a parking garage because there is simply not enough room to keep paving areas for more parking lots.

The K-State Student Union, for example, has 221 metered parking stalls that anyone can use. With the thousands of students, teachers and campus visitors streaming through the Union everyday, this is nowhere near enough parking spaces.

Many schools around the nation with similar enrollment sizes have constructed parking garages to help with parking problems. The University of Missouri has four parking garages for an undergraduate enrollment of 22,898; the University of Kentucky has five parking garages with an undergraduate enrollment of 25,000.

K-State is definitely large enough to have a need for parking garages. I cannot see any logical reason why one has not been built already. It certainly can't be for lack of money, with the Student Governing Association wanting desperately to build a student activity center that would have benefited only a small number of students.

Instead of trying to spending money on this, why not try to spend it on a parking garage or two that would benefit more of the student body and solve this enormous problem we are facing?

Parking will only continue to get worse as enrollment rises. SGA needs to focus on solving problems facing students now.

I think I should be able to retake my test that was last Tuesday because there was too many choices on it.

Why does K-State pay $1 for a 20-ounce bottle of Pepsi when Manhattan High School pays $.75 for the same 20-ounce bottle of Pepsi, huh?

Sorry about the Student Activities Center, Jake, but I just couldn't afford to build your résumé.

My solution to the butterfly replacement? A bingo card and a dobber. I think all those old fogies in Florida can figure that out.

Jesse Jackson is the biggest idiot in the history of the United States of America.

I wonder if Jake will want a recount on Thursday's vote.

Posting syllabi online could prove beneficial for students

Editor,

With enrollment time here again, many students are scrambling to get into the right classes. Some classes may fit perfectly into one's schedule, while a respected instructor offers another.

It is my experience that a student is willing to trade an ideal schedule for the instructor he feels is right.

However, how does a student get information concerning instructors that is not extremely subjective? We all talk to friends to find out who is the "good teacher," but these opinions usually need to be taken lightly.

Students do not have enough access to instructor/course information prior to enrollment. When faced with four or five possible section choices, most students have to leave it up to chance and hope that they select a teacher who is suited to their particular learning style.

Some teachers rely heavily on exams while others believe in projects and class participation. Students should have better access to information regarding course topics, grading procedures, and point allocation prior to enrolling in the course.

Once classes have started and syllabi are presented, getting into a different course section is nothing short of a miracle.

I believe that it should be mandatory for each instructor to make his or her class syllabi accessible online, either through a centralized page, or even more convenient for students, as a hypertext link to each syllabus as a part of the online course schedule. I realize that several instructors already have syllabi posted, but these are often hard to find, and searching can be very time-consuming.

The availability of this information in a centralized location would help students make a more informed, and therefore more appropriate, decision when enrolling.

Funds raised for Habitat house

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

Standing outside for three hours in 20-degree temperatures selling pancakes spells out dedication for one campus group.

On Friday evening, the K-State chapter of Habitat for Humanity sold hot pancakes outside of Varney's Book Store from 6:30 to 9:30 p.m. to raise money for the first-ever Habitat house fully funded by K-State.

Jon Anderson, president of the chapter and senior in construction science management, said the house at 703 Yuma St. is about halfway completed.

He estimates it will be done in April 2001. He said this is the first Habitat house completely funded by the efforts of the K-State chapter.

"We are about halfway to our fund-raising goal," Anderson said. "Friday night was just one of the many fund raisers we will have throughout the year."

Matt Thomas, senior in architecture, said the group had planned to stay in Aggieville until 2:30 a.m. so they could hit the bar crowd with warm pancakes, but scheduling conflicts occurred.

Nevertheless, the group stood huddled around the flat grill trying to stay warm and to sell as many pancakes as possible to people as they walked by.

Thomas said that, overall, he thought the night was successful because it got the group's name and project out and into the community.

"It has been so nice because people are being really supportive by giving donations," Thomas said. "Just being out here makes the group more visible to the community."

As an architecture major, Thomas said he got to design the house the group is building.

"Designing the house was a horrible but valuable experience. I learned so much," Thomas said.

"Now I know when I graduate, I want to do this kind of work for the rest of my life. Housing is the most basic necessity that everyone has a right too."

Daniel Creekmore, work projects chair and sophomore in architecture, said although there were a few scheduling problems, Friday was one of the most fun fund raisers the group has done.

"It is just the whole idea of pancakes, staying up late and interacting with people down here that makes it all so fun," Creekmore said.

This is Creekmore's second year of being involved with Habitat for Humanity. He said he stays involved with the group because he likes working, building and putting things together. For Creekmore, being at the halfway point is very satisfying.

"Actually seeing the house take form is extremely rewarding," Creekmore said. "It is such an awesome feeling that it doesn't feel like you are losing a year of your life to a project, it is more like I get to do this with a year of my life."

Annual winter sale at Union offers holiday preparation

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Following tradition, the K-State Union Bookstore filled the entire store with purple Christmas decorations and played a variety of holiday tunes in anticipation of the holiday season.

The K-State Union Bookstore was host to its annual Wildcat Wonderland, a holiday shopping extravaganza, from 3 to 8 p.m. on Friday. K-State gift items, art demonstrations, refreshments, K-State Santas and holiday specials were showcased.

"It really gets people excited, and it's wonderful kick-off to the holidays," Carrie Mitchell, assistant bookstore manager, said.

Musical entertainment, book signings, Call Hall ice cream, free gift wrapping and a K-State style show completed the day's events. The style show featured new clothing sold by the Union Bookstore.

"We picked out the most fashionable clothing now being sold both in the store and in catalogs and, with all of the help from students, it proved to be a success," Katie Huggins, senior in psychology, said.

The holiday open house was put on completely by a student crew, in order to feature the Union staff and different groups on campus.

People from the Horticulture Therapy Club, Bakery Science Club, Black Student Union, Alpha of Clovia, Wildcat 91.9 and the Union helped throughout the day.

"The Union Bookstore is non-profit, so all of the money we made from this event will benefit everyone on campus," Mitchell said.

With few exclusions, the store reduced everything from 5 to 8 p.m. with a 20-percent discount on regularly-priced merchandise. In hopes of improved business, it was the store's first time to display such a large discount.

"We want people to see that the Union really is the best place for people to buy holiday gifts and K-State clothing for family and friends," Cezanne Greer, senior in advertising, said.

A purple Santa, who can be seen all over the town this month, was available for shoppers to take their pictures with. Although his identity cannot be revealed, the Santa works on campus and helped with the success of Wildcat Wonderland.

"Shoppers of all ages were ecstatic to take pictures with the K-State Santa," Mitchell said. "He volunteers his time and really adds to the holiday spirit in the store."

Wildcat Wonderland, now in its fourth year, has become a tradition that takes place the Friday before the last football game. This year the Union staff found it even more beneficial as they worked to build the image of their new store.

"We have a great facility, and this gave us a chance to show it off," Greer said. "With all of the help from students, employees, campus groups and the community, the event was extremely fun and successful."

Park University plays tournament in memory of teammates, coach

The Associated Press

PARKVILLE, Mo. — A highway crash in western Missouri that killed two college soccer players and their coach has prompted renewed calls for construction of barriers in the median of Interstate 70.

Members of Park University's women's soccer team were bound for the St. Louis area in three vehicles Thursday when a tractor-trailer crowded one of them into the Interstate 70 median near Concordia, about 60 miles east of Kansas City.

The sport utility vehicle crossed the median into westbound traffic where it hit a pickup truck, overturned and struck a minivan.

Killed were coach Jamie Hemingway, 29, and 18-year-old freshman players Melanie Meyer of Independence and Cynthia Anderson of Grimes, Iowa. Two other players and a person in the minivan were injured.

The team was traveling to St. Charles to play Lindenwood University in an NAIA Region V postseason playoff game. The game was postponed to Saturday night, and Park players decided Friday to take part as a tribute to Hemingway and their deceased teammates.

On Saturday night, about 75 friends, relatives and supporters, including members of the Park men's team — which was to play later — were in the stands at St. Charles for the game against Lindenwood.

The accident brought calls for the state to make safety improvements along the heavily traveled Interstate, possibly including barriers to keep vehicles from crossing grass medians into oncoming traffic.

"It's absolutely absurd that this state is so complacent with regard to safety systems," said Bill Quitmeier, mayor of Parkville, the Kansas City suburb that is home to Park University. "The only way I can find a positive out of it is if the coach and these kids didn't die for nothing, and the accident leads to efforts to make the roads safer."

State highway officials have discussed I-70's growing traffic volume, crumbling pavement and increasing safety risk throughout this year. There have been discussions about widening parts of the interstate to three lanes each way.

The Missouri Department of Transportation hasn't considered guard cables along most of I-70, spokesman Joel Blobaum said. He said they're not typically intended for lower traffic areas such as the Concordia area.

Investigators hope to talk to the driver of the tractor-trailer that forced the SUV into the median. The rig did not stop, and witnesses could not fully describe the vehicle or remember its license number, Drenon said.

The truck driver is not considered to have left an accident scene illegally since the rig did not hit the SUV, Drenon said. But investigators are interested in why the rig drifted out of its own lane, he said.

"It could have been that the truck driver had dozed off or was not paying attention," he said.

Team members in a following vehicle said they thought the truck driver was aware of the accident because the rig's brake lights came on briefly and it slowed down.

"But we don't know for certain if he did or did not," Drenon said. "If you wake up or regain attention and realize your vehicle has drifted, your first instinct is usually to tap your brakes and slow down to make sure you've got control."

Medicare, minimum wage bills languish as Congress waits for new president

By ALAN FRAM

The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Lame-duck sessions of Congress are always unpredictable, but the one starting this week could prove even more muddled because of the unsettled presidential election.

Neither party's congressional leaders know whether it makes sense to resolve budget fights quickly or try delaying a deal until the next administration — with either Republican George W. Bush or Democrat Al Gore in the White House on Jan. 20, inauguration day.

Top Democrats seem ready to settle and leave town quickly. With their ally, President Clinton, still in office, they appear eager to shake hands on a huge education, health and labor bill that was nearly

"There's an array of issues that have to be addressed. I don't think we can leave without having addressed them," Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., said Sunday on CBS' "Face the Nation." Earlier, he said, "It will take give on both sides, but I think we can do that."

Five of the 13 annual spending bills for fiscal 2001, which began Oct. 1, are hanging. They cover seven Cabinet departments, dozens of smaller agencies, congressional operations and the District of Columbia's budget.

Also unresolved are a $240 billion, 10-year tax bill; an increase in the minimum wage; higher Medicare reimbursements for health care providers; disputes over immigration and workplace injuries; and an intelligence agencies' bill that Clinton vetoed because it would have criminalized the leaking of some government secrets.

Last Tuesday, voters elected a new Congress that will give Republicans even narrower majorities in the House and Senate than they held this year.

After many months without even speaking to House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., House Minority Leader Dick Gephardt, D-Mo., called Hastert after Election Day and tentatively arranged a meeting for this week.

"I think we can get a lot of work done," Gephardt said Sunday on ABC's "This Week," adding that he hoped the four leaders could all sit down.

Republicans, however, seem undecided about how quickly to proceed and are unlikely to make decisions until they meet among themselves. The House returns on Monday, the Senate on Tuesday.

Some top GOP aides, speaking on condition of anonymity, said it made little sense to agree to spending increases that would shrink the budget surplus that Bush, if he takes office, would have available for future tax cuts and other purposes.

But others said that Bush, if elected, might urge them to quickly settle their differences with Clinton. That would let lawmakers go home, rest and return in January for the new Congress and a White House that will be far easier for them to work with.

battling already has gotten so bad in Congress that the uncertainty over the Bush-Gore election will make little difference.

"The undercurrent of misunderstanding and the unwillingness to bend has been so bad that I don't think it can be any worse," said Rep. Armo Houghton, R-N.Y.

Whatever their strategies, leaders of both parties will have to cope with weary rank-and-file lawmakers who mostly seem ready to finish their last business and adjourn.

"There are things that just have to be left to the incoming president, no matter who that is," Rep. Judy Biggert, R-Ill., said.

The lame-duck session will be Congress' ninth in the past half-century. The last was in 1998, when the House met for a day to vote the impeachment of Clinton.

GOP leaders and the White House have agreed to enact a bill this week that will keep open until the following week those agencies whose spending bills remain unfinished. That would give Clinton time to complete a trip to Asia. Clinton has mostly insisted on daily bills keeping agencies functioning for 24 hours.

"We would be willing to sign" the longer spending extension, White House spokesman Elliot Diringer said Friday.

Unless they work out their budget differences, lawmakers will have little to vote on.

But off the chamber's floor, House Republicans and Democrats will have separate meetings to select their leaders for the new Congress. No changes in the top jobs are expected.

K-State wide receiver Quincy Morgan goes in for a 12-yard touchdown as Nebraska rover Joe Walker tries to tackle him with 2:52 left in the game. The touchdown put K-State in the lead 29-28, enough for the win. Morgan had seven catches for 199 yards and two touchdowns.

K-State shuts down Crouch, Cornhusker running attack

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Entering Saturday's contest, Nebraska's rushing attack had earned its No. 1 national ranking. That came as no surprise to head coach Bill Snyder. Year after year, nobody runs the ball better than Nebraska, he said.

"Undeniably, the finest rushing football team in the United States is the University of Nebraska," Snyder said.

Nebraska had averaged 372 rushing yards per game. The Cornhuskers had three rushers who had accumulated more than 2,000 yards for their careers. Quarterback Eric Crouch is a Davey O'Brien semifinalist, and I-back Dan Alexander is a Doak Walker semifinalist.

Yes, K-State's defense had its work cut out for it.

The result — the Cats held the Huskers to 200 yards rushing and 239 yards total offense.

After the third quarter, Nebraska had only managed 82 yards on the ground. K-State had shut the vaunted Husker attack down.

"It was 11 guys flying around and being where they were supposed to be," linebacker Ben Leber said.

That result, though, said nothing about the ability of Nebraska's players, especially Crouch.

He deserves all the recognition he receives, Snyder said.

"I think he's as fine a player as you'll find anywhere," he said. "I just think we played well. If you give Eric Crouch an

The clock read 6:06 left in the fourth quarter. Nebraska 28, K-State 23.

After the Huskers had taken the lead on back-to-back touchdown runs by I-back Dan Alexander to start the period, the Wildcats needed a late drive. With the ball at its 38-yard line, quarterback Jonathan Beasley led the K-State offense into the NU red zone.

Second and goal: 12-yard line.

Beasley dropped back in the pocket and hit wide-out Quincy Morgan on a crossing route for the go-ahead touchdown. K-State 29, Nebraska 28.

"I think it was a statement drive for this team," Beasley said, "knowing our backs were against the wall. Nebraska scored two big touchdowns against us, and we came back and had a drive like that."

"Nebraska's a great team, and they're physical. All 11 guys on their defense, they hit us and hit us and hit us. And we were able to take those hits and come out with the knockout punch when it counted."

But after the Cats' two-point conversion attempt failed, with 2:52 left to play, the K-State defense would need to hold.

"I had my hands in the hand warmer, and I was just saying, 'come on, defense, stop 'em,'" Beasley said. "Everyone else was jumpin' around, but I was like, 'man, just do it defense and get us the ball back and we'll run the clock out.'"

That they did, and history was made once more, as the Cats downed the Big Red for just the second time in 32 years.

Snyder said he applauded his team's poise and effort in their come-from-behind victory in the fourth quarter.

"When we fell behind toward the end of the ball game, I was really proud of our youngsters," he said. "Guys came back and made plays when they had to make plays."

More importantly, the win gave K-State a shot to meet one of its season goals, Snyder said, as a win over Missouri this weekend would clinch the Cats a berth in the Big 12 title game in Kansas City, Mo.

"That's what I know, that's what I take from this victory," Snyder said. "We put ourselves in the position to compete for a conference championship."

Nevertheless, Leber knows the importance of not overlooking the Tigers Saturday.

"As much as this week kind of puts us in the driver's seat for the North, we still have a Northern Division team to play next week," Leber said, "and if we're not ready, they could come up and get us, and all our dreams would be down the toilet again."

Beasley avenges last year's loss, leads team to victory over NU

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

The score on his locker stood as a constant reminder.

41-15.

"I used it as motivation, knowing that if I don't play well then the offense doesn't play well, so I took it on my shoulders to come out and play better than I did last year," quarterback Jonathan Beasley said.

After last season's 26-point loss to the Cornhuskers in Lincoln, Beasley took it upon himself to lead the Cats over Nebraska in 2000.

That he did, engineering a late fourth-quarter drive to give K-State a 29-28 win

Saturday at KSU Stadium.

Consequently, head coach Bill Snyder couldn't be happier for his senior captain.

"I was really proud of Jonathan. Here's a guy that's lived with all the criticism for a year's period of time," he said. "There wasn't anybody that wanted to accept the fact that Jonathan was injured last year, and that definitely affected his performance a year ago today. And nobody wanted to accept that. Everybody just wanted to criticize Jonathan."

Even his teammates acknowledged the vast amount of criticism slung on Beasley following the 1999 loss to Nebraska.

Record numbers

KSU Stadium set a new attendance mark Saturday as 53,811 showed up to watch the K-State/Nebraska game. The previous record of 53,011 was set earlier this season (Oct. 14) against Oklahoma.

Century mark

With 145 rushing yards against the Cornhuskers, the Wildcats have run the ball for at least 100 yards in 11 straight games.

Long time coming

K-State's victory over Nebraska marked the first time the Wildcats have won back-to-back home games vs. the Huskers (1998 and 2000). The win is also just the second Cat defeat of NU in the last 32 years, as well as the second victory over a top 10 opponent in 21 tries under head coach Bill Snyder.

Aerial artist

Quincy Morgan's 199 yards receiving Saturday gives him 1,074 on the year, making him the first wide out in history to have back-to-back 1,000-yard receiving seasons. Morgan tallied 1,007 yards last year. This weekend was also his ninth 100-yard reception game, tying him for first place on career chart with Kevin Lockett (1993-96) and Michael Smith (1988-91).

Big play capabilities

Morgan has 19 catches of 20 yards or more this season, including 10 of 30 yards or above, seven of 40-plus yards and three of 50 yards or better. He currently sits second in Wildcat history in season receiving yards, eighth in season receptions (54) and third in career receiving yards (2,081).

Scobey scores

Community college transfer Josh Scobey's first quarter touchdown gives him 14 rushing TDs on the season, tying him with Bill Butler (1971) for the most rushing touchdowns in a season by a running back.

Beasley moving up

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley improved in three offensive categories Saturday. He is now in third place in career total offense (5,258), and fifth place in both career passing yards (4,378) and season passing yards (2,372).

Sack stats

K-State's offensive line gave up three sacks, totaling 18 yards in losses, to the Husker defense. Previously, the Cats had only given up a total of three sacks through the first 10 games this season.

Senior day

Saturday's 29-28 victory marked the final home game at KSU Stadium for 26 seniors.

"This was unbelievable for our seniors," quarterback Jonathan Beasley said. "To beat Nebraska at home by one point, and to come through like we did in the fourth quarter and get things done, is a memory we'll have for the rest of our lives."

"Jonathan's taken a lot of heat in the past two years," junior left guard Andy Eby said Saturday. "He's trying to fill Michael Bishop's shoes, and I'm so proud of him. He's taken that so well, and I've never seen him get down because of media pressure, so I'm really happy for him that he led us to victory today."

Wide-out Quincy Morgan, who caught seven of Beasley's passes Saturday for 199 yards, agreed and said he respects the Cat QB for his poise this entire season.

"He took a lot of criticism, but he never let it get him down. That's what I like about him," he said. "He shows up every week and at practice every day and he's the same old guy. He stepped his game up really big today, and we acknowledged that in the locker room."

Although the victory was important for the entire team, Snyder said the win was especially important for Beasley personally.

"I was so happy to for him. It meant so much to him. And I consider that to be redemption," he said. "I think he came back and he played well enough to make some good things happen and give us a chance to win."

In fact, considering the adversity his quarterback had to overcome, Snyder said he's as proud of Beasley as nearly any other player he has ever coached.

"I was proud of him for just what he has endured over a period of time," he said. "And we talked about it in the locker room, and our players applauded him and hugged him, and he was in tears. It meant so much to him, because he accepted the responsibility, which he shouldn't have."

"He had no right to accept responsibility for that loss that we had a year ago up at Nebraska — but he did, and he took it very personally. And of course, all the criticism was heaped on him."

Despite playing with his painful shoulder injury in Lincoln last season, Beasley said he needed to pick up his game Saturday against the Huskers.

"I don't like to use excuses," he said. "Regardless, I need to go out there and play the best I can if I'm injured or not. And I didn't do that last year."

"I knew had to play better for us to have a chance to win. Last year I threw 3-for-19, and you're not going to win any games doing that."

completed 12-of-36 passes Saturday, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said he was pleased to see how Beasley handled himself on the field in light of his struggles against NU a year ago.

"That's something a player has to deal with within himself. He just knew what happened last year, and we spent a lot of time together this week preparing him for this game," Hudson said Saturday. "He missed some throws, but he made the throws when he had to."

"Maybe his stats aren't that impressive, but the fact that he got it done when he had to — that's the sign of a true winner."

"He had no right to accept responsibility for that loss that we had a year ago up at Nebraska — but he did, and he took it very personally."

opportunity to get started, he can create some real problems for you, and I think, by and large, most of the night we just didn't let him get it started."

Indeed, nearly every time Crouch ran the option, he had a K-State defensive end or linebacker meeting him. In one instance, defensive end Chris Johnson blew through the offensive line and dropped Crouch for a 5-yard loss before the QB even had a chance to look at his pitch man.

The K-State coaches simply put the players in positions to stop the option, Leber said.

"They put us in situations that were perfect for us," he said. "It gives us the ability to make plays, and that's what a lot of guys did."

The schemes were so good, in fact, that K-State's players were sometimes in better position to receive Crouch's pitch than his I-backs. Leber, for instance, once got behind Alexander and nearly picked off the pitch.

"I was supposed to be in that position," Leber said. "Actually, if I didn't make that play, I would have been in the doghouse because I was supposed to key him the whole time. I was just lucky I even got a finger on it."

For three quarters, Nebraska was shut down by the K-State defense. In the final period, though, Nebraska's offense woke from its slumber, more than doubling its total offensive output. On the Huskers' biggest plays, Alexander rumbled for touchdown runs of 19 and 45 yards.

The K-State defense was, unlike earlier in the game, out of position, Leber said.

"They came at us with a little more downhill stuff. They kind of went away from the option, and that's what we were keying pretty much the whole time," he said. "After a couple of series, we adjusted and got people where they needed to be."

However, until the Cats adjusted, Alexander continued to roll up yards with 5- and 7-yard gains on a tired-looking K-State defense.

If the Cats were tired, though, they shouldn't have been, Snyder said.

"What I explained to them was you didn't play any more snaps than you normally do," he said. "We probably played 70 snaps. We play 70 snaps every ball game."

Actually, the Cats only played 58 snaps on defense, so according to Snyder, they had no excuse to appear worn out in the fourth quarter.

"It's a mental thing. If you want to be tired, you can be tired — that's easy," Snyder said.

"It's that thing that says, 'Oh shoot, here we're back on the field again. Come on offense, get this thing going,' rather than saying, 'Hey, you put me on the field, I'll stop them, wherever we have to do it. And if I have to grab the ball and run it in for a touchdown, I'll do that, too.'"

K-State did eventually get that attitude, holding Nebraska scoreless and giving up only 25 yards on its final two possessions.

Defensive lineman Mario Fatafeh especially acted out Snyder's message.

"This was the last game I was going to play at K-State, and if it was going to kill me, or I was going to have to kill somebody, somebody was going to go down," he said. "I emptied my gas tank — save nothing for tomorrow — that's how I went out."

TYPICAL SANDLER

Comedian's 'Little Nicky' offers few laughs, special celebrity appearances

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

In "Little Nicky," Adam Sandler proves yet again he can play the lovable idiot ... this time in another plane of existence — Hell.

Sandler stars as Nicky, the clumsy spawn of Satan (Harvey Keitel), who goes to Earth to search for his sinister brothers (Rhys Ifans and Tom Lister Jr.). The two bullies plan to take over Earth and dethrone their father.

On his voyage to Earth, Nicky finds not only a companion in a talking dog, but also the joy of Popeye's chicken, an ambiguously gay roommate (Allen Covert) and a nerdy woman, Valerie (Patricia Arquette), who becomes his love interest.

Special appearances are abound in this film. Celebrities such as Ozzy Osbourne, Jon Lovitz, Henry Winkler, Rodney Dangerfield, Quentin Tarantino and Reese Witherspoon (as Nicky's mother, a valley girl-like angel) grace the screen. In fact, there are so many celebrity appearances and special effects, it's as if director Steven Brill is trying to take the focus off the fact that this is yet another typical Sandler movie.

However, true fans of Sandler's work won't be disappointed. Those of us who just find him annoying, though, won't expect anything out of this movie.

It's just another of Sandler's lovable idiot characters in a movie that tries to save itself with celebrities and special effects. To some, it might be a step in the right direction.

However, the same type of character gets old after a while. Sandler is just another "Saturday Night Live" alumnus whose career cannot advance past making goofball comedies with recurring character types.

This isn't to say there aren't scenes in the movie that didn't give me a chuckle. Look for Hitler in a French maid outfit being sodomized by a pineapple in Hell, as well as Henry Winkler being attacked by a swarm of killer bees.

Besides the occasional laugh, "Little Nicky" doesn't deliver much else. The special effects and guest stars are just trying to disguise the painfully obvious — Sandler won't be breaking out of his cycle of bad movies anytime soon.

Inspiring film challenges naval prejudice

It is a tale of endurance, strength and attain the rank of master diver chief.

The movie spans Brashear's career in the U.S. Navy and the hardships he endures while trying to make a name for himself.

Brashear enters the Navy under the command of Billy Sunday (Robert DeNiro), a tough-as-nails commander who, at first, wants nothing more than to see Brashear fail. Brashear is subjected to acts of racism on the part of his fellow officers, as well as the powers-that-be. Yet his dream of being a diver, and the best one, is what keeps him going.

Years later, just when we think Brashear has settled into his life as a naval officer and will be successful, his life takes a drastic turn, and his commitment to everything he holds dear is tested.

Director George Tillman Jr.'s choice of actors for this movie couldn't have been better. DeNiro has played this tough-guy type of role his entire career, and he plays off Gooding well. To see two such actors with different backgrounds (one the Hollywood veteran, the other still fairly new to the silver screen) in such clashing roles is a real treat.

The supporting cast includes Charlize Theron ("The Legend of Bagger Vance") as Gwen and Aunjanue Ellis ("In Too Deep") as Jo, the wives of Sunday and Brashear.

Theron's character is a tragic but strong woman who has competed against the Navy for her husband's affections for years. Ellis' character, meanwhile, is a woman who is in danger of having the same thing happen to her. Gwen is the woman who Jo doesn't want to become. However, both are strong women who stay by their husbands when anyone else probably would've left them long ago.

highest levels of government. But Brashear's tale shows us that one person truly can make a difference, contrary to what we might think.

There is hope, though. Cmdr. Sunday goes through an intense transformation as Brashear forces him to confront his racial prejudice by being the best. DeNiro's character shows us that people truly do change. Similarly, Brashear learns to battle a physical disability that could mean an end of his career.

It also shows us that even physical constraints can't deter someone who is intent on making his or her dreams come true.

Like many semi-biographical movies, "Men of Honor" sends an inspirational message to anyone who has experienced adversity when trying to achieve goals.

Special teams play area of concern

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State beat Nebraska, but it didn't win the special teams battle.

In fact, the Cats' special teams play was just ridiculous, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"There's some things that happened with special teams that were detrimental to us. Certainly to give up a touchdown on the first punt of the ball game was ridiculous," he said, "and to punt the ball at 15 yards a crack was ridiculous."

Actually, the Cats averaged 28.7 yards per punt, but the fact of the matter doesn't change. K-State handed Nebraska an easy seven points and dug themselves an early hole, Snyder said.

"That's kind of an adverse set of circumstances to start right off the bat," he said. "Your offense is three and out, and you punt the ball, and all of a sudden you're seven points down, and your defense hasn't been on the field yet. That's not a lot of fun."

Even though K-State managed not to get any more punts blocked, the team was almost put into a similar situation in the second quarter.

The Cat offense was backed up third-and-24 on Nebraska's two-yard line. Quarterback Jonathan Beasley ended up getting the team out of the situation with a 35-yard completion to receiver Quincy Morgan, but had that pass gone uncaught, the result would have been very bad.

The Cats' poor punting might have forced them to do the unthinkable, Snyder said.

"If we're punting out of our own end zone, we're in serious trouble. We were in serious trouble punting any place tonight, and certainly out of our end zone," he said Saturday. "I would have taken the safety."

Of course, the Cats' punt team didn't suddenly decide not to play well. Nebraska forced many of K-State's mistakes, special teams guru Brice Libel said.

"I think they put a lot of pressure on him, so you've just got to get it off sometimes," Libel said in defense of punter Travis Brown. "The thing I think people overlook is that Nebraska has really good special teams units, so we were going up against a good team, and we didn't always come out on top."

The special teams woes didn't end with the punting team, either. In the third quarter, Aaron Lockett returned a punt 79 yards for a touchdown, only to have it called back on a holding call.

If that had been just the first time a big return was nullified by a penalty, it wouldn't have been so bad. But K-State has seen their returns negated time and time again, Snyder said.

"Aaron Lockett, between he and David Allen, I think they've returned a hundred punts for touchdowns, and they had them all called back," he said. "That's nonsense."

Not all aspects of the special teams were horrible, though. Place-kicker Jaime Rheem was a perfect 3-for-3 on field goals, Libel said.

"Jaime did a hell of a job today, as far as kicking it off and field goals," he said.

In addition to Rheem, the entire field goal team, and especially holder Mike Ronsick, played very well despite battling adverse weather.

"I take my hat off to our snapper and our holder because Ronsick did a great job getting the balls down," Rheem said. "There were a couple of them I just soccer-kicked from one step away just because of the conditions. He did a hell of a job getting the ball down."

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/Collegian

Aaron Lockett gets a hug from Thomas Barnett after K-State's 29-28 victory over Nebraska on Saturday night at KSU Stadium. With 3:27 to play in the third quarter and the Cats' leading 23-14, Lockett's 79-yard punt return for touchdown was called back due to a holding penalty, one of several K-State special teams mistakes against the Cornhuskers.

handcounting of ballots — in effect throughout the country since the nation's founding, yet here alleged to be unconstitutional and indeed to be vulnerable to a form of judicial intervention extraordinary in our federalism," the Gore reply says.

The marshaling of legal forces sets the stage for one of the most dramatic periods in American political history. A climax could come at the end of this week when final overseas mail-in ballots will be counted and the trailing candidate would be forced to concede or push deeper into uncharted waters.

"By next Friday," said Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., "the pressure on someone is going to be enormous to accept whatever results Florida has reached."

Their public financing drying up, both camps are raising money to pay rafts of lawyers and political operatives sent to every corner of Florida to examine county voting records and wage a campaign-style, poll-tested public relations battle.

The Bush team dispatched an "urgent message" by e-mail Sunday asking supporters for up to $5,000 to help finance the recount campaign. Democrats are hoping to raise $3 million, with top Gore aides moving from his headquarters in Tennessee to Democratic offices in Washington.

Among the weekend developments:

— Palm Beach County, Fla., election officials added three dozen additional votes to Gore early Sunday in a mechanical recount. Leaders of the Democratic stronghold then decided to manually check each of the 425,000 votes cast. One top county official said he will try to block the move.

Officials said their manual recount of precincts representing 1 percent of the vote turned up 19 votes for Gore beyond a machine count. Carol Roberts, a county commissioner and a member of the Palm Beach County canvassing commission, argued that a manual recount of 100 percent of the precincts could potentially change as many as 1,900 additional votes — far more than the existing statewide margin between the two candidates.

— In Deland, Fla., Volusia County

officials began a marathon manual recount of all 184,018 ballots, despite Bush's pending request to stop it. With Democratic-laden Daytona Beach included, Gore's team hoped to pick up more votes.

— Polk County, Fla., officials, rescanning ballots by machine for a third day, found an additional 104 votes for Bush and seven for Gore. Home to Lakeland, the county went for Bush.

— Democrats added Osceola County to their list of hand recount requests. The Osceola canvassing board meets Monday to weigh it. Gore had a small lead over Bush in the 54,000-plus votes cast in the county just south of Orlando. Hispanic voters alleged they were required to produce two forms of identification when only one was required.

— Florida secretary of state Katherine Harris, a Republican who has campaigned for Bush, scheduled a meeting Monday with Christopher and Gore campaign chairman William Daley as Democrats expressed concern that she might refuse to certify ballots uncovered in the manual count.

— Bush had a 17-vote lead in New Mexico, where state police have begun impounding ballots from Tuesday's election. Republican lawyers asked the courts to order protection for early voting and absentee ballots cast statewide.

A Gore-requested manual recount in Broward County, Fla., another Democratic bastion with Fort Lauderdale as its hub, was to begin Monday. A hearing is scheduled for Tuesday in Miami-Dade County, site of what Gore hopes will be a fourth manual recount.

Bush and Gore were in seclusion with top aides Sunday — Bush at his Texas ranch, Gore at his Washington, D.C., residence. Bush has made several public appearances since Tuesday, casting himself as a man preparing for the transition to power. Gore has laid low, wary that voters might interpret his legal challenge as a grab for power.

If Bush fails to win an injunction against the manual counts, a prospect that even GOP officials say is likely, his next step would be fateful. Senior strategists say Bush is likely to seek recounts in some GOP-dominated Florida counties if the Gore-backed recounts and overseas balloting put him in danger of losing the lead.

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/Collegian

Derrick Yates celebrates after the K-State defense stopped Nebraska on fourth and 5 with 51 seconds remaining in the game. The Wildcat defense held the Cornhuskers to 39 passing yards, allowing only two completions on 13 attempts.

Ballard's Sporting Goods, witnessed the crowd as it came through Aggieville with the post about an hour and a half after the game's end. He said the fans were chanting and cheering, but they were nothing like they were two years ago.

"There was probably a couple hundred people, but not as many as last time," Hutchens said. "People were pretty hostile last time, but there didn't seem to be any problems and things ran smoothly."

Hutchens was busy selling

T-shirts when the post passed by, just like he was in 1998. Instead of the "Big Red is Dead" shirts Ballard's printed two years ago, Hutchens said he sold close to 300 shirts with "Oops ... We Did It Again" printed on the front.

The goal post came down in just more than an hour from the game's end, and David Woodruff, who was on the post for a few minutes, said it seemed like it took an eternity to bring it down.

"Everyone was going nuts down there," Woodruff, senior in elementary education, said. "It was like a big mosh pit, and there were all sorts of things flying through the air."

He said there were people pushing and shoving, but he didn't think anyone was seriously hurt.

"Everyone came together and was there for one reason. We were all there to celebrate the victory over Nebraska," he said.

Mike Arria, assistant general manager at Chance, said he wasn't sure if the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics would come and take the upright back.

"When this happened a couple years ago, they came a week later and took it," Arria said. "We wanted to mount it up there, but Coach Snyder wanted it back so every member of the team could have a piece."

"They might just say we can keep it, though. It wasn't as big of a game this time."

Arria said that because the post was supposedly unbreakable, the athletic department might need the upright back.

Andy Bartlett, assistant sports information director, said he believes the post is the same type of guaranteed, undestructable post that came down in 1998. He said he thinks the cast-iron post will be replaced by the company in Chicago.

"No one has started to discuss anything about it yet. The decision to take it back or not will come early this week," Bartlett said. "It's not as much of an issue this time, especially since we don't have any more home games."

Broken heating pipe in Denison Hall leads to canceled classes, clean-up effort

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Flooding from a broken heating pipe caused classes in Denison Hall to be canceled and heating to be shut off in both Denison and Holton halls Monday afternoon.

"When you get an old campus with old lines, you are bound to get breaks sometime," John Woods, director of facilities services, said.

Other campus buildings have had breaks and are older than Denison, but this pipe break might be indicative of greater problems in the building.

For some years, university officials have planned to tear down Denison when it had another place to locate the Department of English, Helen Cooper, assistant director of planning, said.

"We will maintain it so that it is functional, but we will make no other alterations," she said.

Cooper said the building's heating and cooling system was not up to current standards. It is not handicap-accessible, and the classrooms are not as functional as they could be.

One option for the English department would be to move into the building occupied by Lafene Health Center and move Lafene to Sunset Avenue, said Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance.

Student responses to the plan have been mixed. Some said more parking would add convenience, while others said moving the health center from its central location on campus would make it less convenient for students.

Cooper said there were no plans to replace Denison with another building if it were torn down. That area probably would become green space, she said.

Christopher Cokinos, assistant professor of English, said a move could come none too soon.

Two classes that he teaches were canceled because of the flood.

Class was just getting started in Denison 120 at about 11:30 a.m. when water began to seep from under the wooden platforms into the room.

The class was evacuated and was going to be relocated, but the water quickly invaded almost every room on that floor with at least an inch of water.

Custodians from crews across campus were brought in with yellow mop buckets and blue and silver wet vacuum cleaners to clean up the mess.

Woods said little damage was done to the Denison offices and classrooms, but the break cost the university several thousand dollars in labor as about 15 custodians were called on to help in the cleanup.

All rooms were expected to be available for use and the heat restored by 5 p.m. Monday.

Cokinos said the flood was the worst maintenance problem he had seen in the past few years.

"Facilities is being responsive," he said, "but the patient is terminally ill. It should be allowed to die."

Cokinos said the maintenance problems were frustrating.

The carpet in Denison 120 had recently been removed because at some earlier point it had been wet and had begun to mold.

The department had to throw out dictionaries, about 200 bound master's theses and other books because of mold problems earlier this year.

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Hulan Jack was one of many facilities custodians from crews across campus who brought yellow mop buckets and wet vacuum cleaners to clean up after flooding from a broken heating pipe canceled classes in Denison Hall on Monday.

KPL merger not likely to up rates

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

KPL Gas Service and Kansas Gas and Electric have made a merger agreement with the Public Service Co. of New Mexico.

"There will be a new company, which is yet to be named," said Kim Gronniger, senior director of corporate communications for Western Resources.

It will be 12 to 15 months before the merger is completed.

"Companies such as these need to become bigger to be more competitive, so it's a move in a positive direction," Gronniger said.

Gronniger said when the merger has been completed more than 1 million retail electric customers and 400,000 retail gas customers in both Kansas and New Mexico will be served.

"When companies expand and become bigger, more customers are able to receive their services, which is a good thing," she said.

City stiffens laws to quiet loud citizens

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

The city is taking more aggressive steps to silence noisy Manhattan residents.

After a third noise violation within one year, the city can declare a residence a disorderly house. This not only allows the city to punish the residents of the house, but the owners, as well.

The tenants or landlords could face a maximum of six months in jail and a $500 fine.

Michael Kearns, city prosecutor, said he has only used the ordinance once since he took office in December but might be handling another case soon.

"Once we found the owner of the house, the bottom line was that the tenants were evicted," he said.

The majority of noise complaints are resolved much more amicably, said Larry George, community relations officer with the Riley County Police Department.

Summer class funding focus of task force

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's funding of summer school will be evaluated at today's Faculty Senate meeting.

A task force committee formed last year to study summer school trends and funding problems will present its findings and recommendations to senators, Tom Herald, chairman of academic affairs, said.

"The task force studied types of courses, who took them, enrollment and teachers who had to come back," he said. "Senate will now vote to extend its current policy that was implemented last summer to 2003."

Summer school is funded differently than the fall and spring semesters, which leads to several problems, Jim Legg, chairman of faculty affairs, said. The Kansas Legislature allocates money to universities in regular semesters, but not in the summer.

"The biggest problem that somehow needs to be resolved is summer school is totally self-funded," he said. "Anything done in summer school must be paid for by tuition made in summer school."

Bush, Gore continue to battle in Florida for presidency

MONDAY'S DEVELOPMENTS

■ New Polk County figures showed a 100-vote gain for Bush from recount totals originally announced by the county this weekend.

■ Volusia County, a Democratic-leaning jurisdiction, awarded Bush a net gain of 33 votes after a full day of recounts. The Deland, Fla., officials also sued in state court to extend the 5 p.m. Tuesday deadline. Gore and Bush quickly joined the case, as did Palm Beach County.

■ Officials in Democratic-leaning Broward County, with Fort Lauderdale as its hub, found four additional votes for Gore after hand counting 3,892 ballots.

■ Officials in Palm Beach County, a Democratic bastion, announced workers will begin hand counting 425,000 ballots today and expect to finish Sunday.

■ A hearing was scheduled for Tuesday in Miami-Dade County, site of what Gore hopes will be his fourth manual recount. In Osceola County, Democrats withdrew their request for a manual recount.

■ Reform Party candidate Pat Buchanan said he was asking officials in the four Democratic-leaning counties to stop the recounts until his allies can get in place to monitor the action. Some Democratic voters in Palm Beach County have complained that they might have voted for Buchanan by mistake because of a confusing ballot.

The fight for the White House tumbled into the courts Monday as a transfixing nation witnessed the historic entanglement of presidential politics and the judiciary. George W. Bush fought on two fronts to halt recounts that threatened his 388-vote lead in Florida, while Al Gore said neither man should prevail from a few votes cast in error.

Amid a whirlwind of political and legal intrigue, Bush's lawyers failed to win a court order barring manual recounts in Florida — a state whose 25 electoral votes will almost certainly determine the nation's 43rd president. A federal judge rejected the Bush injunction request, and his team was deciding whether to appeal.

Separately, the state's top elections official — a Republican who campaigned for Bush — said she would end the recounting at 5 p.m. today.

"The process of counting and recounting the votes cast on Election Day must end," Secretary of State Katherine

"The process, to sum it up, is selective, standardless, subjective, unreliable and inherently biased."

— GOP lawyer Theodore Olson

Harris said.

Gore immediately appealed the ruling, making his first significant legal push, and Bush joined the case on behalf of Harris.

A statewide machine recount trimmed Bush's lead from 1,784 votes to 388, prompting Gore to push for painstaking manual recounts in four largely Democratic counties. One of those recounts is under way, a second begins today and a third county will consider the request at a hearing today.

In a blow to Gore, officials from the fourth county — Broward, in southeast Florida — sampled three precincts

Monday and found only four additional votes for the vice president. They rejected Gore's request to count the rest of the county's 500,000-plus ballots.

"The process, to sum it up, is selective, standardless, subjective, unreliable and inherently biased," GOP lawyer Theodore Olson told the judge.

Olson said the recount-by-hand introduced elements of chance and partisan bias to what ought to be a simple and uniform process of checking Florida's extraordinarily close election result.

Democratic lawyers disputed GOP claims that the hand counts could go on for weeks, saying they almost certainly will be complete by Friday. Overseas absentee ballots are due the same day, setting the stage for a potential climax to the political drama.

A breathtaking day of activity began with a meeting between Harris and two top Gore advisers — former Secretary of State Warren Christopher and campaign

Birthday drinking binge kills Michigan student

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — A University of Michigan engineering student died Monday after celebrating his 21st birthday with 20 shots of scotch in 10 minutes, police said.

Byung Soo Kim was blue and unconscious when he was found early Saturday. He died at a hospital, where he had been admitted with a blood-alcohol level of 0.39 percent, nearly four times the legal limit for driving, police said.

Eleven friends had gathered in an apartment building Friday night to celebrate his birthday. Police said Kim was trying to down a shot for every year of his life but passed out after the 20th drink.

Friends told investigators they put him in the back bedroom and when they checked on him an hour later, they discovered he was not breathing.

"If he was 20, there would be a lot more to investigate," Sgt. Michael Logghe said. "Since he's 21 and allegedly made the purchase legally himself, there's no crime in what occurred."

Injured teen-ager sues police following accident

BRADENTON, Fla. — A teen-age driver seriously injured in an accident is suing the city because a police officer failed to arrest him for drunken driving minutes before the crash.

Richard L. Garcia filed suit last week, alleging that officers who found him at a 1999 disturbance told him to drive home. He crashed his car minutes later, rupturing his aorta.

"He's got a plastic aorta now. For a (teen-ager), that's pretty wicked," attorney Wade Thompson said.

Garcia and his mother, Betty

Hernandez, are seeking damages exceeding $15,000. They say Garcia's medical bills are nearing $100,000.

Police went to a home at 1:20 a.m. Feb. 9, 1999, after a man found Garcia climbing into his stepdaughter's window. She apparently had invited him in, police said.

Thompson said Garcia, then 16, obviously was drunk — he stumbled, his car was parked cockeyed and numerous open beer cans were visible in the vehicle. But the officers let him drive away, he said.

Bradenton officer Robert Semler made no mention in his report that Garcia was drunk.

A few minutes after Garcia drove from the girl's home, he missed a curve and slammed into a tree.

Garcia's blood-alcohol level was found to be double the legal limit for adults and almost 10 times the limit for minors. He later pleaded guilty to drunken driving and received one year probation and a fine.

Skiing safety examined in wake of Vail accident

EAGLE, Colo. — A man whose deadly collision with another skier prompted a safety crack-down by Colorado resorts went on trial for manslaughter Monday, with prosecutors saying he ignored poor snow conditions as he sped down the mountain.

Nathan Hall collided with Allan Cobb after finishing his shift as a lift operator in April 1997. Cobb died a few minutes later.

Since it was the last day of the season, Hall should have known the snow was heavy and wet, prosecutor John Clune said during opening statements.

Defense attorney Brett Heckman asked the jury to recall popular opinion in the days before Michael Kennedy and Sonny Bono were killed in ski accidents.

POLICE REPORTS

Reports are taken directly from the K-State and Riley County police departments' daily logs. We do not list wheel locks or minor traffic violations because of space constraints.

Riley County
Saturday, Nov. 11

- At 8:15 p.m., Brent A. Craft, 6240 Partridge Lane, was arrested for probation violation.
- At 9:30 p.m., Jennifer A. Brown, 2419 Charolais Lane, was arrested for DUI.
- At 9:58 p.m., Travis M. Winter, 1015 Blumont Ave., Apt. 1, was issued a notice to appear for theft.
- At 10:35 p.m., Jason L. Zartman, Goodland, Kan., was arrested for transporting an open container. Bond was set at $500.

Heckman has called the collision an accident and said skiing is a sport that carries an inherent danger.

Hall is charged with reckless manslaughter, possession of alcohol by a minor and possession of marijuana. If convicted, he faces up to six years in prison.

Two courts dismissed the charges, ruling a reasonable person would not have expected skiing too fast to cause another person's death. But the Colorado Supreme Court overturned those decisions, setting the stage for Hall's trial.

Stamp prices rise 1 cent

■ Attempting to counter rising costs, Postal Rate Commission raises prices.

By RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The cost of mailing a letter will be going up a penny, probably in January.

The Independent Postal Rate Commission acted Monday on a request by the Postal Service for a rate increase to offset rising costs.

Under the commission's action, the price of a first-class stamp will rise to 34 cents. But the 22-cent cost of a second ounce of first-class mail will stay the same, as will the 20-cent postcard. The Postal Service had asked that the second-ounce rate be raised by two cents and the postcard by 1 cent.

The post office Board of Governors will decide when the higher rates will go into effect. Jan.

7 is said to be the likely date.

The Postal Rate Commission approved the increase after months of hearings and deliberations. The higher rate for a first-class stamp will bring in about $1 billion a year.

The commission also raised the cost of mailing two pounds of Priority Mail from $3.20 to $3.95.

The last rate increase, which tacked a penny onto the cost of a first-class stamp, was Jan. 10, 1999.

Because it takes so long to print the billions of stamps needed when new rates take effect, the Postal Service already has interim stamps in the works.

In the past, those changeover stamps carried letter designations, A through H, but that practice has been discontinued.

The post office's proposed increases averaged about 6 percent over all classes of mail.

In addition to letters and postcards, the Postal Service sought significant rate increases for such things as magazines and catalogs. The post office is required by law to base its rates on the cost of handling each type of mail; when rate cases go before the rate commission, hours are spent debating whether costs have been properly allocated.

Postmaster General William Henderson has noted that the 1-cent boost in first-class mail rates is below the rate of inflation.

The post office had a $363 million profit in its 1999 fiscal year but was expecting to lose money in fiscal 2000, which ended Sept. 30. Final figures are scheduled to be announced in December.

Unlike its commercial competitors, when the Postal Service wants to raise prices it must seek permission from the rate commission and provide detailed supporting documents. The commission then has hearings and issues its decision; the process takes 10 months.

Tick risks continue to be prevalent outside of regular seasons

By JIM REINTJES
Kansas State Collegian

Summer is long-gone and winter is less than two months away, but the risk of getting a tick-borne disease lasts all year.

The regular tick season is from mid-March through October, and there is a fall tick season from October through November. People can still acquire ticks on warmer days in January and February.

Don Mock, professor of entomology, said extreme weather conditions can affect the tick population and some species of ticks can become active during a warm spell outside of the regular tick season.

"A really hot, dry summer can set the tick population back, and a cold, dry winter can be hard on the ticks," Mock said.

He said the dense vegetation protects the insects from the sunshine and that the vegetation in the eastern one-third of Kansas supports a greater density of birds and rodents that the immature ticks feed off of and that the adult ticks feed off of medium to large animals.

Mock said in addition to collecting ticks from host animals for research, he drags a corduroy or flannel cloth through a grassy area or attaches the cloth to a stick and brushes it against a tree.

He said ticks will crawl to a host from several yards away and that they don't jump out of trees.

"Ticks can't jump," he said.

"Ticks stand on their two hind legs and reach up with their six other legs and grab onto whatever brushes by. If you're walking through the grass, they will snag on to your pant leg. They will crawl until they find skin."

He said three kinds of ticks can normally be found on people and pets in Kansas but not all over Kansas.

"The only tick that can be found from about Salina west is the American dog tick," he said.

"Ticks stand on their two hind legs and reach up with their six other legs and grab onto whatever brushes by. They will crawl until they find skin"

— Don Mock, professor of entomology

"You don't normally encounter the other 15 to 20 species that are present in Manhattan unless you're specifically looking for them on wild animals."

Mock said from Manhattan east, the lone star tick, which is abundant in the Manhattan area, can be found from Salina east. The black-legged tick, also known as the deer tick, can be found from Topeka east.

Connie Reding, keyboard

operator in diagnostic medicine at the College of Veterinary Medicine, acquired five ticks in August. From those tick-bites, Reding contracted the tick-borne disease ehrlichiosis, which can be fatal if not treated. Reding said she probably would not have known about ehrlichiosis if she wasn't employed at the college.

"I had an advantage because I work in vet-med," Reding said. "I thought it was just for animals, and I got it."

She said she still had the tick and when she got flu-like symptoms, seven to 10 days after being bit, she took the tick to Roman Ganta, assistant professor of diagnostic medicine and pathology.

"It's so uncommon," she said. "I don't think other doctors would have recognized it."

She said she took the antibiotic Doxycycline for three weeks and that she still had a headache a week after she stopped taking the antibiotic.

Ganta said ehrlichiosis was first found in dogs. The first reported human case of ehrlichiosis in the United States was in Arkansas in 1986, and all 50 states have reported cases now.

Ganta said the symptoms of ehrlichiosis normally appear seven to 10 days after being bit, and that it can be cured in two to three weeks if treated early. He said people 50 and older and those with weak immune systems are more likely to develop serious complications from the disease.

Ganta said ehrlichiosis awareness is growing and that he suspects there will be a lot more reported cases in the years to come.

He said of the reported cases of ehrlichiosis in the United States, 4 percent have died from the disease. Those who have died had delayed treatment, were older or had weakened immune systems.

"It is better to be treated," Ganta said.

"Just one person dying is significant."

Tick Safety

- Wear light-colored clothing.
- Tuck pants into socks.
- Apply tick repellents.
- Conduct a body search after being outside.
- If a tick is found, save it.

Tick Removal Tips

Do:
— Grasp the tick's mouthparts against the skin using pointed tweezers.
— Pull back steadily with gentle force

Don't:
— Pull back sharply, as this might tear the mouthparts from the body of the tick.
— Squeeze or crush the body of the tick because this might force fluids into the skin.
— Apply substances such as petroleum jelly, fingernail polish or remover, or a lighted match to the tick.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

Full competition, benefits coming for Kansans

On October 26, Southwestern Bell Kansas took what we hope will be the final step toward garnering some giant benefits — like more choices and better value — for Kansas telephone customers. That's the day we filed our application with the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to offer long-distance service here in Kansas.

Approval of our application will mean another, better long-distance choice for Kansas consumers — one with simple, no-gimmicks service plans, competitive rates and top-quality service.

In Texas, where its FCC application was approved last June, Southwestern Bell Texas is offering basic residential long-distance service for 9 cents a minute — one rate for all calls, anytime, in- or out-of-state — with no monthly fee.

With our entrance into the long-distance market here, Southwestern Bell Kansas will have similar, easy-to-understand plans — as well as one-stop shopping for all communications and entertainment services — available to customers like you.

The main regulatory requirement for approval is that our local telephone markets must be open to competitors. In Kansas, they are. In fact, we currently have competitors in 100 percent of our wire centers and 100 percent of the counties served by Southwestern Bell.

Add the Kansas Corporation Commission's recent endorsement of our application, and we're hopeful that Southwestern Bell Kansas will be entering our state's long-distance market by early next year.

For now, it's the FCC's call. But soon, we hope the calls are yours — through Southwestern Bell Kansas long-distance service.

Get informed. Get involved.

Denison Hall plans should be finalized for benefit of KSU

Denison Hall is falling apart and has been for a long time.

The flood that occurred Monday from a broken heating pipe caused classes to be canceled in the building. This is beyond ridiculous.

Students pay for a quality education. Quality means we deserve to be in a safe learning environment. Professors deserve to be instructing in rooms without health hazards.

For a considerable amount of time, university officials have been planning to tear down Denison. Incidents like this prove it is past time to do something about this problem.

Granted, accidents occasionally will happen that are beyond control. Yet this only is a sign of more negative things to come.

Some of those negative things already have occurred. Earlier this year, the Department of English had to throw out dictionaries, other books and about 200 bound master's theses.

The building's heating and cooling system was not up to current standards and it is not handicap-accessible. This is a problem that needs to be solved as soon as possible.

If Lafene Health Center is moved to Sunset Avenue, there is a possibility the English department will be moved into Lafene's space. If this does not happen, another plan of action needs to be researched.

Either Denison needs to be renovated or it needs to be torn down.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Now, realize I think probably more than half of the people down there pulling the goalpost down weren't students. So think of that before you start assigning blame.

A hearty bravo to everyone involved in the production of "A Funny Thing Happened On The Way To The Forum." We attended the Saturday matinee and had a marvelous time.

You know I won't vote for a raise in student fees for a student activity center, but I will vote for a cheaper goalpost next year.

K-State fans face the toughest goalpost strength of schedule in the nation.

Hey, K-State Marching Band, you played a march on Saturday. Best half time show in five years. Congratulations.

The GTAs only get $9,000 a year, but they spend $50,000 on a torn down goalpost. That's great.

Hey, purple, thanks for keeping the red colors out of the stadium.

I was just wondering, are they going to assess that 15-yard penalty against Oklahoma at the kickoff of the Big 12 Championship?

If we had problems with our goal posts, how difficult are the goal posts in Arrowhead if we beat the Sooners?

Yeah, I didn't get my secret decoder so I could read the crossword puzzle. Where can I pick one of those up?

EVERYTHING YOU NEED, NOTHING YOU DON'T

Alternatives offered for defunct student activities center

Enough of this student activity center thing. The word is out: students will not pay $6.50 for something as menial as facilitated student involvement and communication. We get that sort of positive reinforcement by shelling out a cover for a kegget on Thurston Street.

The reason for a lack of enthusiasm toward the SAC project is not that students are cheap, short-sighted and easily swayed by scare tactics; we most certainly are, but that does not explain the disillusionment toward the privilege fee hike. The problem is that our student leaders are not offering enough alluring campus upgrades.

I have decided to propose some more feasible additions to our campus. While many of these ideas are in their infancy, they offer a glimpse at what truly could make K-State the best university in the nation.

First, Denison Hall has become quite an eyesore. The building lacks character and beauty and detracts a good deal from the university's charm. Thus, I propose we combine a $20 privilege fee hike with alumni contributions and implode the unattractive hall. In the location would be placed The Sixth Year, a bar operating between 8 a.m. and 5 p.m., catering to students looking to relieve stress before, after or during particularly difficult tests. Within one round of finals the facility would have paid for itself and all students would be able to more fully enjoy a Physical World lecture with a Jack and Coke in hand.

Second, we all have seen that fork outside of King Hall. While some would say it is a great work of art, I believe it is a utensil in dire need of accompaniment. Thus, for a mere $1 per student, I suggest we remove the fork, replace it with the much more sensible spork and add a knife and saucer. I still fail to see any artistic value, but at least we would have a complete set of ridiculously large stone dinnerware.

Next, anyone entering Cardwell or Nichols halls would notice that both halls are sorely lacking in ... well ... many females of any sort. Thus, as a free upgrade to our campus, it is my desire that Bluemont and Justin halls join with the aforementioned buildings to institute a geeky-men-for-woman exchange. This plan would be of great help to both parties. The women would be supplied good amounts of tutoring with minimal Star Trek discussion, while we male engineering types would be afforded the opportunity to see and maybe even talk to females in a non text-based environment.

K-State offers lecture series that bring renowned speakers from around the nation to our campus. However, we are missing an integral portion of America's best. Thus, I propose we institute a $1 fee increase and start a Distinguished Burned-Out Actor Series of lecturers. Imagine a star-studded group of lecturers such as Gary Coleman, Jaleel White (a.k.a. Steve Urkel), and that guy who played Rosco P. Coltrane on "Dukes of Hazard" speaking at K-State. With such a series, we would be the envy of colleges everywhere.

The advent of the winter season and its accompanying colder weather has led many to the stunning conclusion that K-State's campus is not temperature controlled. To remedy this ill, I believe a fee increase of a mere $20,001 per student could be utilized to encase the entirety of campus (except for Dickens Hall, let 'em freeze) in a biodome. Such a dome would allow the Student Governing Association to decide our weather for us and keep students safe from rain, snow and, depending on who writes for the paper next semester,

CLINT MUDRICK

VINCE JACOBSON/Collegian

even fire and brimstone. Other small additions could be instituted. Among these are a $0.01 fee increase to put filters on the Campus Fourum, screening out that idiot who won't stop calling in about the "Mildcats" and the guys with the annual calls on April 20. Second, who would not be willing to shell out $5 a semester to add a distillery to the grain science department at Shellenberger Hall?

Finally, the plan that would most help students at K-State. For as little as $7, we could place a three-story addition to the K-State Student Union near Kedzie Hall containing several subdivisions. Unlike other truly ridiculous schemes recently offered, this would not be helpful to students in any way; rather, this addition would be utilized as a haven for bad habits. The cornerstone facilities would cater to drunkenness, laziness, procrastination and general apathy. Independent cubicles could be devoted to the lesser student ills, among them being distraction, disillusionment and the "Oh my God, why the hell am I in engineering?" syndrome.

But enough of that. As was suggested in an earlier fourum about me, it is time to once again discuss the squirrels. What if a tree fell on one in the forest and nobody heard it? It is time they get represented. Thus, as an addition to one of the trees near the Union I would like to be the first to suggest a new SAC, the squirrel activity center, where we finally can give squirrels the voice they deserve.

Ephedrine in Kansas offers dangerous, legal ride

Discovered thousands of years ago by the Chinese, this evergreen plant derivative is the main ingredient in products most Americans hail as lifesavers. Want to lose weight? Want to have more energy? How about controlling your asthma? Many would suggest you try ephedrine.

History
Ephedrine has long been obtained naturally from the plant Ephedra equisetina for use as a central nervous system stimulant. First synthesized in 1904, pseudoephedrine is the artificial chemical equivalent with less side effects that is marketed today. You might know some ephedra products more commonly as Sudafed, Metabolife 356, Ripped Fuel, Ultimate Orange and Hydroxycut.

How It Works
Ephedrine works by stimulating alpha and beta receptors, causing norepinephrine release. This stimulation causes increased heart rate, bronchodilation and vasoconstriction. For those of you without a medical dictionary, imagine how you felt the second you realized we beat Nebraska. Only ephedrine's effects last longer. You have artificially stimulated a "fight or flight" situation in your body.

If you are an athlete, this means you have better use of oxygen than normal.

Ephedrine is banned in the Olympics because it's an unfair advantage for you to utilize all 21 percent of the oxygen in the atmosphere while others can't.

If you are overweight, this means your body enters thermogenesis, a fancy medical term for heating up. The increased heart rate leads to increased metabolism, which burns more calories to keep your body at the elevated temperature. You burn off fat by causing your body to run a constant fever. The high amounts of norepinephrine give you the feeling of extra energy, but you'll lose that as the chemical is eliminated from your system.

Many people using ephedra products for the reasons listed above try to use it too much. The first use of any ephedra product is the most effective, as the adrenal glands are stimulated to produce less and less adrenaline with subsequent uses. The human body develops a natural tolerance, and users are forced to take more and more of the product to attain the desired effect. High amount of ephedrine are believed to cause kidney stones.

I'm going to go out on a limb by using my ESP skills and predicting that sometime next month you'll hear reports on massive kidney damage to these habitual users.

Abuses
In March 1996, 20-year-old Peter C. Schelldorf, of State University of New York in Albany, died in a Panama City, Fla., hotel room after consuming nearly 400mg of an ephedra stimulant.

In 1998, the defendants in his case settled for $2.5 million, one of the few ephedra case settlements that have been disclosed.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration "...has received an increasing number of reports of adverse reactions associated with ephedra use..." However, ephedra products are still marketed without FDA screening, in accordance with the 1994 Dietary Supplement Health and Education Act. Although banned in Canada and more stringently controlled in some states, Kansas continues to treat ephedra products with a blind eye.

This isn't to say that the state doesn't know regulations are needed. On campus, Lafene Health Center stopped carrying crystalline ephedrine more than five years ago. You still can purchase pseudoephedrine in Sudafed (hence the name), but that's the closest you'll get.

Ephedra — known to some as "legal speed" — is most often abused by over dosage, although there is no recommended dosage because it is an unregulated drug. In Manhattan, college students purchase some OTC ephedra pills known as mini-thins, consume alcohol and then pop some "legal speed" for a rush similar to other amphetamines including 4-methyl-2, dimethoxyamphetamine. Yes, similar to ecstasy.

Another grossly ignored fact is that operating meth labs may use ephedra products as a precursor for methamphetamine production. Kansas ranks near the top in the United States in the number of meth labs operating, due in part to understaffed law enforcement and a large amount of readily available anhydrous ammonia. But even without ammonia, I could go downtown, buy ephedrine over the counter and, with my knowledge gained from one semester of organic chemistry, produce methamphetamine.

Legislation is needed to make ephedrine products available by prescription only. No extensive studies exist to show the potentially lethal affects of abusing ephedrine products but people are dying. It is treated the same as vitamins and chewing gum, but it deserves much more respect. People need to be protected from the unknown dangers of the "lifesaver" known as ephedrine. Someone needs to set some limits on "legal speed."

Internet self-diagnosis can be inaccurate, dangerous

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Internet access is the latest resource for people searching for health information, even allowing Web surfers the chance to diagnose themselves.

Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion for Lafene Health Center, said there are all kinds of health Web sites.

"There are Web sites with very accurate and very good info on health," Kennedy said. "However, there are also questionable Web sites out there."

Kennedy said it could be dangerous for students to diagnose themselves through Internet information.

"They may not have the knowledge to make the complete picture," she said.

Stephanie Welch, junior in business, said she doesn't think using the Internet is a good idea.

"Personally, I think it's a stupid idea," she said. "How can a person diagnose themselves without medical knowledge or no degree in the medical field? I would think that making a random guess is not a good idea."

Kennedy said relying only on Internet health information can be harmful.

"The students' condition may require treatment, but their health care will be delayed because they might solely base everything off the Internet," Kennedy said. "They might use the Internet to avoid seeing a physician."

Laurie Quaife, freshman in business, said she wouldn't recommend self-diagnosis to others.

"I think seeking out professional help and care would be more advisable," she said. "If it were a serious condition, I think a second opinion would be necessary."

Kennedy said the Internet can be a great access tool for an information resource.

"You have so much available info to use," she said. "However, too much info can also be overwhelming, so you have to be careful."

It is possible to distinguish credible Web sites from misleading Web sites, Kennedy said.

"Look at the sources, find the disclaimer, investigate the intention and liability of the site, and watch out for drug promotions," she said.

Kennedy said there are certain things people can do to evaluate the Web sites they are using.

"Find out if the info is updated regularly, the information is credible, complete and accurate, there are follow-up info options, feedback options and who is funding the source," she said. "Advertisers can have influential effects."

Kennedy said a reliable Web site might promote a product so Internet users should be cautious — if a drug company sponsors the Web site, a person should be sure the company isn't out to make a quick buck.

Researching health information is a good way to begin the process of self-diagnosis.

"It's great to do research for those who are interested in a specific condition," she said.

"However, the Internet is not always accurate. The library can be a great resource."

Kennedy said Lafene will be adding a computer in its lobby to assist students.

"They can look up info on our Web site," she said. "It's a guide to weed out the accurate Web sites versus the non credible."

The Lafene Web site, www.ksu.edu/lafene, is available to everyone, especially people having difficulty finding information.

"It is up-to-date, and continually maintained," she said. "If students have trouble with the site, they can ask for our assistance."

Kennedy said if students are concerned about information retrieved off of a Web site, they can bring it to a Lafene physician.

"It is easier and more beneficial to the student if they print off the page," she said. "Most of the time physicians cannot help their patients, because they receive their information from hearsay."

Kennedy said physicians want patients to understand the information and the Internet is a good way to do so.

"Physicians are willingly to discuss the source with their patients," she said.

Kennedy said if patients understand information they are more willing to seek treatment.

"If they believe the information, they are more likely to follow it, and any advice received about the subject matter," she said.

Welch said she still believes that it is better to seek out a physician.

"For me it would be quicker to go to the doctor and get it taken care of than making a guess, which could be more dangerous in the long run," she said.

Clinton makes historic visit to Vietnam

By TERENCE HUNT
The Associated Press

KONA, Hawaii — President Clinton, nearing his final two months in office, embarked Monday on an Asian journey centering on a historic visit to Vietnam to cement ties with a former wartime adversary.

During a refueling stop in Hawaii, Clinton and his daughter, Chelsea, stopped at a nearby resort where they took an afternoon walk on the beach.

The president also spoke with Hawaii Gov. Ben Cayetano before returning to the airport for a flight to Brunei, where more than 20 Asian-Pacific leaders were gathering for an economic summit.

The trip was going on despite the current stalemate in the presidential election, but officials say it demonstrates that national business is continuing without interruption.

Besides Chelsea, Clinton was accompanied on Air Force One by his mother-in-law, Dorothy Rodham. His wife, Sen.-elect Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., will join the president in Vietnam after attending the funeral Wednesday of Leah Rabin, wife of assassinated Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

While at the Asia-Pacific Economic Cooperation Summit, Clinton will confer with Russian President Vladimir Putin and Chinese President Jiang Zemin. But the emotional highlight is certain to be Clinton's visits to Hanoi, the capital of a unified Vietnam, and to Ho Chi Minh City, formerly Saigon.

The trip is the first to a unified Vietnam by an American president. It comes 25 years after U.S.-backed South Vietnam surrendered to North Vietnam, leaving many Americans classified as missing in action.

"Our nation has sought to move forward in developing these relations in a way that both honors those who fought and suffered there, and does right by the missing and their families," the president said.

Noting that the remains of 283 Americans have been repatriated since he took office in 1993, Clinton said he will visit the site where U.S. and Vietnamese teams are searching for remains of Air Force Capt. Lawrence Evert, missing since his plane was shot down Nov. 8, 1969.

"In our national memory, Vietnam was a war," he said. "But Vietnam is also a country, a country emerging from almost 50 years of conflict, upheaval and isolation, and turning its face to a very different world, a country that can succeed in this new global age only if it becomes more interdependent and open to the world."

Club domination

Defense, communication key to K-State's victory

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State women's basketball wrapped up a perfect 2-0 exhibition campaign Sunday with an 88-67 victory over winless Club Volna at Bramlage Coliseum.

The game featured aggressive defense from junior Shalonda Booker, key free-throw shooting by freshman Andrea Armstrong, abundant three-point scoring by Kim Woodlee and April Sailors, and more communication than last game among all players.

In turn, the Wildcats dominated the contest, maintaining the lead for all but the game's initial 1:02.

"I think we did a great job communicating on the floor," Sailors, senior point guard, said. "Everyone was real talkative out there, and everybody gave it 100 percent and was very composed. We just competed really well tonight — as a whole."

After surviving their first exhibition contest against KSC Szekszard's physical man-to-man defense last Tuesday, the Cats were forced to play a more perimeter-based offense against Volna, head coach Deb Patterson said.

That meant K-State would have to switch from a post-dominant offense to one that demanded ball movement and control in the backcourt, along with composure in the paint, Patterson said.

"We did a much better job tonight in terms of taking care of the basketball," she said. "I like the fact that we took care of the ball."

Sailors said the post also was impressive against a physically strong team.

"I think all of our post did a really good job today of being under control," she said. "They were under control, composed, getting their feet ready for shots and making passes, so I think all of them did a really good job today."

finished the game one rebound short of a double-double with 14 points and nine boards.

Filling in for Nicole Ohlde, Armstrong went 10-for-13 from the charity stripe. Woodlee attributed Armstrong's success at the line to her dedication during the preseason.

"Andrea spent many hours in the preseason shooting free-throws," Woodlee said. "If it took her two hours, it took her two hours. She made 20 in a row before she left everyday."

Cats utilize long shot in exhibition win

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

There wasn't a blackout in Manhattan on Sunday, but K-State shot the lights out of Bramlage Coliseum from beyond the arc.

In fact, three-point field goals accounted for almost 53 percent of the Wildcats' scoring.

"I was happy that we shot the ball well from the three-point line," head coach Deb Patterson said.

The Cats shot the ball so well that had the game been played during the regular season, some K-State record books would need correction fluid.

INJURY REPORT

Four Wildcats missed Sunday's action with injuries. Kristin Rethman and Nicole Ohlde sat out due to soreness from practice. Morgan Finneran was sidelined recovering from a foot injury, and head coach Deb Patterson said Big 12 Preseason Freshman of the Year Laurie Koehn might be redshirted this season with a foot injury.

Although all marks are safe in exhibition contests, the Cats' 16 three-pointers in Sunday's contest would have surpassed the team's former record of 13, set in 1995 against Lamar.

With nine treys, Kim Woodlee also would have tied the Cats' individual record for three-pointers in a game, racked up by Shawnda DeCamp in 1993 against Detroit Mercy.

Against Club Volna, K-State began the contest with four consecutive three-pointers to establish a 12-4 lead, one it would never relinquish.

After connecting on 12 of 20 first-half attempts, the Cats added four more in the second half to end the game at a sizzling 61.5 percentage from downtown.

Woodlee said she was impressed and pleased with the way the Cats shot on Sunday. After leaving it all on the floor,

Missouri vs. K-State kickoff changed for Saturday game

Kickoff for Saturday's football game between the Wildcats and Tigers has been rescheduled for 11:38 a.m. CST.

The Big 12 Conference announced the time adjustment this weekend, as the game will be broadcast regionally over the air as part of Fox Sports' syndication package.

The game marks the ninth time this season K-State football has been televised, tying the 1998 season for the most appearances in school history.

Also on the conference broadcast schedule this Saturday will be Texas Tech at Oklahoma, which will air on ABC regional at 2:30 p.m. CST.

In addition, on the slate for Nov. 24, ABC will televise two Big 12 conference games.

Colorado at Nebraska can be seen at 11 a.m. CST, followed by Texas A&M at Texas at 2:30 p.m. CST.

The Nov. 25 contest pitting Oklahoma at Oklahoma State also will air at 2:30 p.m. CST on Fox Sports Net regional cable.

Big 12 Championship seats to be available to students

In the event that K-State defeats Missouri this weekend in Columbia, the Wildcats will represent the North Division on Dec. 2 in the Big 12 Championship game.

A victory over the Tigers would give K-State a ticket to Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo., to face South Division champion Oklahoma.

If such is the case, Sports Information Director Doug Dull said K-State would be allocated 8,000 tickets for the conference title game.

However, as of Monday, he said he's uncertain when those tickets will go on sale if the Cats down Mizzou on Saturday.

"We're not ready to do that type of thing at this point in time," Dull said.

Site honors Cats' Morgan as national player of week

Wide-out Quincy Morgan was announced Monday as the Rivals.com National Player of the Week.

Morgan had seven catches for a career-high 199 yards and two TDs in K-State's 29-28 victory over Nebraska Saturday.

The senior from Garland, Texas, caught the winning touchdown, a 12-yard strike from QB Jonathan Beasley with 2:52 remaining in the contest.

His yardage total of 199 marked the most receiving yards ever by a Wildcat in a regular-season game.

Darnell McDonald (1997-98) has the K-State record overall, notching 206 yards receiving in postseason play at the 1997 Tostitos Fiesta Bowl in Tempe, Ariz.

Rheem chosen as finalist for top placekicking award

The Palm Beach County Sports Commission and Institute announced three national finalists Monday for the 2000 Lou Groza Collegiate Placekicker Award.

James Rheem, senior from Wichita, was selected out of 20 semi-finalists, along with Cincinnati's Jonathan Ruffin and Tennessee's Alex Walls.

The award, presented by the FedEx Orange Bowl, will be given Dec. 5 at the Sheraton West Palm Beach Hotel in Palm Beach County, Fla.

Mortimer leads women's cross country team to nationals

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

Saturday ensured the K-State women's cross country squad that its season would indeed continue.

Last weekend, the eighth-ranked Wildcats competed in the NCAA Midwest Regional Championships, an event that sent the top-two teams to the NCAA Championships while everyone else began their preparations for next season.

Led by sophomore Amy Mortimer, who won the regional individual title for the second consecutive year, the K-State women secured themselves a place in the NCAA Championships Monday, Nov. 20, in Ames, Iowa.

Mortimer's time of 20:34 was 11 seconds better than fellow teammate Korene Hinds, who finished second on the 6,000-meter course.

Senior Annie Wetterhus finished eighth, while Amanda Crouse's 21:26 time earned her 16th overall.

"They did a very nice job pacing through the course, setting themselves up with a strong ending on the course," head coach Randy Cole said. "They've really been feeling better physically and they came out and executed really well."

Ekaterini Fotopoulou finished 35th, Cate Holstrom landed 40th, and Julianne Kronoshek rounded out the women's squad, finishing 62nd in the field of 164 runners.

Meanwhile, the men's squad failed to qualify for the NCAA Championships after finishing 12th overall on the 10,000-meter

Snow-covered defeat of Nebraska ranks as greatest in school history

It's amazing how one snowy night can change an entire purple-wearing nation.

Three weeks ago, it was difficult to find a K-State supporter who wasn't disenchanted, if not downright pissed, at the Wildcats' disappointing slump.

But four flashing numbers on the scoreboard and 20,000 screaming fans was as medicinal to Purpleville's sadness as a 2-liter bottle of Nyquil would be to the common cold.

One 29-28 victory was all it took to transform Manhattan from the Grinch cave of gloom and doom into the happiness of Whoville at Christmas time.

It seems odd to the rest of the world that the victory over Nebraska would warrant a goal post-attacking response from the Wildcat fans. It seems odd that these fanatics didn't seem to notice that the win did nothing for the National Championship hopes that once seemed so close.

But none of that matters. Nothing else matters more to K-State than a down-to-the-wire, one-point, snow-laden upset over the No. 4/5 team in the nation and nemesis Nebraska.

It doesn't matter that the Wildcats broke their 25-game home-winning streak against Oklahoma.

It doesn't matter that the Wildcats lost the nation's respect and dropped to as low as No. 19 in the polls after losing to Texas A&M.

It doesn't matter that K-State most likely will play a tough Sooner team in the Big 12 Championship game.

It doesn't matter that the national title hopes are gone and the Wildcats might need a miracle to get into a BCS bowl.

The Wildcats erased it all. They put the doubters to rest and came back from a 28-23 deficit to surprise Nebraska fans and the world.

Yes, that 29-28 victory was the most important, if not most memorable, moment in K-State football history. Consider all the aforementioned mishaps they overcame.

Add to that the victory's importance to the season, and you've got one for the ages.

Suppose just for the sake of argument that the Wildcats lost Saturday to NU. They would've had three losses for the first time since 1996. That would have been a huge step back from the string of three consecutive 11-win seasons.

This win put them on track to win the one conference trophy Bill Snyder doesn't have: the Big 12 Championship prize.

Put those significant morale victories with the magic of the win and it all makes sense. The Wildcats have beaten Nebraska for only the second time in 32 years — that in itself is amazing. Unlike in 1998, they beat a great Nebraska team that some considered to be the best in the nation.

They beat them on Senior Day as the snow came down at just the right moment. And most of all, they showed they had heart. They proved they could be beaten and still come through as seconds weaned off the clock.

Yes, this win was as good as any. It was more memorable than the 40-30 triumph in 1998 to break the 30-game slide against the vaunted Huskers. It meant more than the 35-18 clobbering of Syracuse in the 1997 Tostitos Fiesta Bowl that gave K-State its first main bowl victory.

"We thought we were going to win no matter what," Jarrod Cooper said after Saturday's victory. "We were all on the same page. And with 27 seniors it was just raw emotion. This was the biggest win in my life. It was way bigger than in 1998."

Remember, no matter what happens Saturday in Columbia, or at Kansas City, Mo., at the Big 12 Championship, or the day after selection Sunday — the Cats have that victory — one they and you won't forget.

And that's all that matters.

The Cryptquip is a substitution cipher in which one letter stands for another. If you think that X equals O, it will equal O throughout the puzzle. Single letters, short words and words using an apostrophe give you clues to locating vowels. Solution is by trial and error.

Sharkey's Little Groove Box is made up of drummer Jeff Sharkey (left), guitarist Blake Chaffin, lead singer and guitarist Jeremy Hollembeak and Andy Gough (front), bassist.

Still Groovin'

STORY BY JJ DUNCAN ■ PHOTOS BY CLIF PALMBERG

Despite difficulties, Sharkey's Little Groove Box continues to entertain

Many practice hours, lots of gigs and money for equipment are what it takes to be a good band, but not everyone thinks about the sacrifice of social life, the sleep deprivation and even the toll on school work that it takes.

The members of Sharkey's Little Groove Box have been experiencing the difficulties of being in a band for the past two years, working around college schedules to work on music. To bring the band together regularly, scheduled practices are important, said lead singer and guitarist Jeremy Hollembeak, junior in chemical engineering.

"We're still working on getting a practice time when everyone can show up," he said.

Blake Chaffin, lead guitarist, said it often turns out to be more than just a practice.

"We got to the point where it's like work," Chaffin, junior in marketing, said.

Hollembeak said he agreed the practices are a lot of work.

"It's not just a leisure activity for us," he said.

Hollembeak and Chaffin met their freshman year and began making plans for putting a band together. With the addition of bassist Andrew Gough, junior in public relations and drummer Jeff Sharkey, Sharkey's Little Groove Box became a reality, Hollembeak said.

In the beginning, it was difficult to find times when everyone could practice because the schedules conflicted so much, Hollembeak said.

"At first, you have to practice a lot, so we all had to put our social lives on hold for a couple of months until we could play a few hours of music together," he said.

The extensive time commitment of being in a band doesn't end after a set of songs is established, Gough said, because the commitment continues because of practices and gigs. He said the time it consumes can be strenuous on relationships, and has endangered what he has with his girlfriend.

Balancing the responsibilities of being in a band, succeeding in school and maintaining a social life is difficult, but Hollembeak said the band members are forced to do it if they want to keep the band going. Each aspect has its own consequences if neglected, so sometimes one priority is compromised for another, he said, including lowering school expectations.

"When I was in high school and when I first got here, I was like, 'I'm gonna get an A in every class,'" Hollembeak said. "Now I'm in this band, and as long as I pass my classes, that's cool."

Since the band has been together for more than two years and the members have experience working around one another's lives, they have begun to plan their school schedules so it is easier to get everyone together at once, Chaffin said.

"Before we had a set time for practice, one person would call around and another wouldn't be able to practice and you have to call like three people back and tell them it's not on," he said. "It was just a big mess."

To make practicing easier, the band rents a storage space outside of town where the members practice. Chaffin said the equipment is always set up this way and there is no one around to complain about the noise, so it is worth the extra money.

"The cops actually shut down one of our practices when we were set up in someone's basement because one of the neighbors complained about us," he said.

To improve the band's sound, shows often are recorded and listened to together. Hollembeak said this enables them to find rough spots, loose ends and mistakes so they can focus on certain areas or certain songs and make the practicing process more effective.

"Before a show we run through a set list to make sure we know all the songs well but we have a catalog of about 50 or 60 songs that we don't even have to practice," he said. "That lets us work on individual areas that need attention."

Gough said they are unsure of Sharkey's Little Groove Box's future, but for the time being they are working on a new album, playing as many shows as possible to promote themselves and setting up a Web site for anyone curious about the band.

Hollembeak said new songs are always being worked on, and the band's goal is to be in the studio by January and have a new album out by next fall. The future of the band will be determined by the success they have and the album is part of that. With graduation visible in the distance, Hollembeak said the band members have begun to think about what will do after school is over.

"We are starting to look at things in terms of a couple years down the road and I think once we all graduate, we're going to give it a shot," he said. "We're going to do what it takes to get our name out there and see if we can make it."

Despite the strenuous conditions of life while in a band, Sharkey's Little Groove Box is still together, which Gough said can be considered a feat in itself.

"If it doesn't work out and it turns out we're not going to be able to keep the band going after college, we're still going to be happy we did it," Gough said.

"We'll all have degrees by that point, hopefully, but we won't forget about this, and we'll be happy to have the experience."

Andy Gough is the bassist for Sharkey's Little Groove Box. The next show for the band will be Nov. 17 at the Bijou in Hays, Kan.

Volleyball team sweeps KU

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team swept the season series against Kansas with a 3-0 win in Lawrence on Saturday.

The victory propelled K-State into the USA Today/AVCA poll at No. 24, the first time it has been ranked since losing at Missouri on Sept. 30.

With the win, the Cats (18-6, 12-4) also finished the series with an unblemished record against the Jayhawks (14-12, 5-12). Not only did they not lose a match, but the Cats didn't lose a single game to Kansas in two matches this season.

In the first match (Oct. 4), it was outside hitter Liz Wegner who led the way for K-State with a career-high 29 kills, and she played well once again this time around, hitting a team-high 19 kills.

Wegner didn't have the biggest performance, however. That honor belonged to outside setter Lisa Mimick, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"Lisa Mimick had her best match as a Wildcat," he said. "She was doing everything — passing, blocking, hitting, digging. Her plate is so full."

Mimick and Wegner's play was indicative of the entire team as well. Earlier in the season, the Cats had struggled to both start and finish games strong, especially on the road. Against Kansas on Saturday, however, K-State started well and never looked back, McLaughlin said.

"We played well. We got better and better as the match went on, both offensively and defensively," he said.

As a result, K-State is nearing its goal for the season — to peak when it counts, in November.

"We said that we were going to be a good team in November, and we're doing the things that we have to do," McLaughlin said. "We're taking care of details on offensive plays, and we're putting the ball right on the money. It's allowing us to run the offense."

course, bringing their 2000 season to a close.

Senior Jean-Paul Niyongabo, in his final cross country performance for K-State, had his strongest outing of the year, finishing 11th overall with a time of 30:51.

Junior Shadrack Kimeli, who had been K-State's top finisher in every event this year, finished close behind Niyongabo with a time of 30:56, earning him 15th place individually.

While Niyongabo and Kimeli both earned All-Midwest Region honors, their finish was not strong enough to gain them an individual berth in the NCAA Championships.

"For pretty much all of the men's team, they turned in their best times ever on the 10,000-meter course," Cole said. "Niyongabo and Kimeli were with the lead pack with a mile to go, but they fell back. They did run exceptionally well, though."

she said she would like to see that kind of performance again later in the Cats' season.

"I'd like to bring it back later on in the year," the senior sharp shooter said. "I don't care much about saving anything, though."

One of Woodlee's bombs was the result of a behind-the-back, no-look pass from her fellow backcourt mate, April Sailors.

"I knew she was there," the senior point guard said of Woodlee. "I kind of got myself into a little too much trouble dribbling into a trap, but with instinct I just had to throw it somewhere."

Sailors' assist came with time running down on the shot clock and Woodlee standing, ready to shoot, on the wing.

"I juggled it a little bit," Woodlee said, "and truth be known, if I would have had more time on the shot clock I probably wouldn't have taken the shot."

Woodlee and Sailors sat open on the wing many times in Sunday's game — a result, Patterson said, of Club Volna's zone defense.

"I think teams that make a decision to play us zone are really playing with fire," Patterson said, "because I really do believe we have the ability to be a very effective team from behind the three-point line."

Patterson said her team's three-point shooting will be important to the Cats' success, but she doesn't want to rely solely on the trey for the team's offensive production.

"I don't want to be a ball club that simply lives on the three-point shot," she said. "That's why I think that inside production is an area where we need to continue to improve, because you've got to have balance to be effective in this league."

ready for something to go on the record."

Patterson said she agreed and that the team's focus now turns toward regular season competition.

"I'm looking forward to it, and I know the team is as well," she said. "We're looking forward to having the opportunity to line up for one that counts

BASKETBALL

Sophomore Danielle Hutton poured in 10 points and grabbed 10 boards en route to recording the game's only double-double.

After scoring just two points before halftime, Hutton went 2-for-

3 in the second half and added four free-throws to accomplish the feat.

With two exhibition wins under their belts, the Cats are ready for the Nov. 17 season opener against UMKC, Woodlee said.

"We're definitely ready for a real one," Woodlee said. "We consider these real ones, too, but we're chairman William Daley. Keeping firm to the Tuesday deadline, Harris said state law does give her leeway for when to certify ballots in natural disasters.

Within the hour, one of the four counties sued in state court for the right to complete its manual recount. Gore's lawyers joined the suit, accusing Harris of doing the bidding of Bush and his brother Jeb, the Florida governor. Bush's legal team joined in to defend Harris.

Such politically charged rhetoric carried the day, with both sides struggling to control public opinion. Gore and Bush have been advised that there might come a time shortly after the absentee ballots are counted this weekend when the trailing candidate needs to concede or risk fallout from a public growing weary of the saga.

Ever-changing voting figures in Florida gave Bush a 388-vote margin out of some 6 million votes cast. The figure does not count the absentee ballots from Floridians living overseas — or the manual recount totals.

Gore leads in the nationwide popular vote by about 200,000 votes, but the Electoral College tally is so close that whoever takes Florida almost certainly will win the White House. Only three times in the nation's history has a candidate won the popular vote but lost the presidential race, the last time in 1888.

If Bush fails to stop the manual recounts in court, his options would be slim. Senior political strategists have said Bush could seek recounts in some GOP-dominated Florida counties to make up for ground lost.

However, a Republican source familiar with the Bush campaign's legal strategy said the possibility that Bush would seek to expand voter recounts to other Florida counties was perceived as unlikely at this time because deadlines for requesting such recounts have expired in many counties.

Bush's team also has threatened to demand recounts in close-voting states won by Gore. But without Florida, Bush would have to win Oregon, Iowa and Wisconsin to claim the White House — a long shot given that Gore is leading by 5,000 or more votes in all those states.

Gore could face a similarly tough decision if he does not pull into the lead this week, advisers said. He has not ruled out a number of legal options, including filing suit on behalf of voters in Palm Beach County who say their ballots were confusing.

"The rate case will justify as to why we are looking for a rate increase," Gronniger said.

Gronniger said the Kansas Corporation Commission sets the rates, and the Public Service Co. will have no effect on rates.

"The rates could go either up or down," Gronniger said. "KPL and KGE are requesting a rate increase. KPL customers have not had a rate increase since 1984."

complaints result in a citation being issued, he said. When an officer requests them to decrease the noise, most residents take care of the problems, he said.

A first violation of the city noise ordinance can result in up to a $50 fine and $50 in court costs. A second offense can cost $75 to $100 in fines plus court costs, and a third offense can result in a $200 fine and court costs, Kearns said.

"Usually after the second time, people wise up and figure out they don't want to be doing that," he said.

George and Kearns said the noise ordinances are present to protect quality of life for all residents. Manhattan has many neighborhoods in which both families and students live. Some of these people want to be able to sleep, Kearns said.

Parties on the weekends are not the only problem. It's people who are having roaring parties on Monday nights or other week nights, Kearns said.

He said people can save themselves a lot of heartache if they would inform their neighbors they are going to have a party.

"It is about being respectful of other people's rights," George said. "If someone calls to complain, turn it down a little bit."

Antonio Baker, junior in criminology, said letting his closest neighbor know he was having a party didn't keep him from getting a noise citation. He said he didn't think his music was too loud and he didn't deserve the ticket.

Baker said he thought the tickets didn't deter people from being loud.

"If I don't feel like I am breaking the law, I am going to continue to do what I am doing," he said.

Traci Gray, sophomore in sociology, said she thought she also had an agreement with her neighbors about noise.

She said she wished her neighbors would have asked her to quiet down before calling the police.

Although Gray said she thinks she should not have received a ticket, she thought the noise ordinance was fair.

"If I was in their position, I'd probably feel the same way," she said.

Officers have some discretion in how they deal with complaints, George said.

A first complaint might lead to just a warning. If the party is too out of hand, officers might occasionally disburse it, he said.

If people want to have amplified sound such as a disc jockey or band, they have to apply for a permit with the city clerk's office. The office personnel would prefer that those applications are in 48 hours before the event. The permit costs $20.

"Does that allow you to make all the noise you want? No," Rick Doan, city clerk, said.

Residents are still responsible for notifying their neighbors and keeping the music at a reasonable level, he said.

The music can last only go until 10:45 p.m., and the speakers need to point toward the apartment or house.

Parties are getting bigger, Doan said.

Instead of one apartment having a party, an entire 12-plex might be involved.

He said the new disorderly house ordinance has put some teeth into noise enforcement.

FUNDING

The lack of funding results in less-than-adequate faculty salaries and low academic standards, Buddy Gray, Senate member, said.

"We are concerned about faculty salaries, but we are most concerned with the quality of education," he said. "This is not an economically driven decision."

In 1999, K-State adopted a policy that stated professors who taught one summer class should make a regular semester's one-month salary, Legg said. If they teach two classes, they would make two months' salary. However, an individual could opt to accept less than that.

Often, graduate teaching students or anyone else in need of money will take the jobs for less money, Gray said. This can give way to less than qualified teachers in some cases.

It can also hurt students' scheduling, Gray said.

"Some courses that might be necessary for students can't be offered," he said. "Students do need summer school. Students do want summer school."

Summer school has changed so much over the past few years that universities need state money to keep up with student demands, Gray said. It has become more essential to university programs and students' schedules.

K-State will lobby the Kansas Board of Regents and the Legislature to change the current system within the next three years, Gray said.

"Administrators have discussed with us the possibility of going to the legislature and asking them to fund summer school in the same way," he said. "It makes absolute, ultimate sense to me. The way it's funded is outmoded."

If this doesn't change, the problems will only get bigger, Legg said.

"The alternative is you just don't have many classes available that students need."

Riley County Law Enforcement Center readies for opening

Although carpenters and electricians were still putting the finishing touches on the Riley County Law Enforcement Center on Tuesday, the county has plans to move administrative operations to the new facility Monday.

Administration, then 911 services and finally inmates will occupy the $10.8 million facility at 1001 Seth Child Road.

Steve French, assistant director of the Riley County Police Department, said RCPD officials wanted to make sure everything was in perfect working order before the inmates arrive. He said he did not know exactly when that will be.

"We don't want any surprises," he said. "We want to be absolutely sure that everything is ready."

RCPD also is being careful with the 911 system.

"This is not like a business that can shut down at 5 o'clock Friday night and open up the next day ready for business," French said.

Once the administrative services move, they will be using a new automated phone system. However, the first option in the system advises the caller to hang up and call 911 in case of emergency.

The new jail has the capacity for 127 inmates, compared to the 19 inmates the county's current facility at Sixth and Colorado streets is designed for. However, the county has been regularly housing 39 to 45 inmates in that facility.

Officials said they did not know if they would house inmates from other counties, but Ed Klimek, vice chairman of the law board, said they would look into that option as a benefit to those counties who are short on space.

The county would receive revenue for any inmates housed from outside the county.

The new facility also includes a women's unit. Previously, women had been housed at the detention facility in Geary County, and other inmates were being housed in six other counties.

The facility has a work release unit, which was not possible at the county's old jail. Inmates also will be able to work within the facility.

Meeting rooms will be available for religious or educational programs. The jail will have a library with access to law books or statutes on CD-ROM.

A maximum-security unit can house 32 inmates. Two of those cells are medical units that can isolate inmates with communicable diseases like tuberculosis.

All inmates will be classified as they enter the facility, which is something the county hasn't done before.

The new electronic locking systems are a far cry from the lock-and-key system at the current jail. The locks are controlled from monitoring stations within the cell units and from a master control room. That control room also allows the corrections staff to monitor feed from more than 40 video cameras inside and outside of the facility.

Except for exercise or a job in the facility, the inmates never need to leave their units. Food will be brought into the units, and each unit is equipped with showers and bathroom facilities.

Russ Fry, county commissioner, said the law enforcement center was the result of a four-year process that relieved a long-standing need. It is being supported by a half-cent sales tax that went into effect January 1999.

When Riley County law enforcement was consolidated in the 1970s, the sixth and Colorado facility was supposed to be its temporary home, Fry said.

The facility will be dedicated Dec. 16 with an opportunity for members of the public to tour. The RCPD is also offering an event being called a "sleepover" from 4 to 11 p.m. in the new facility.

The cost of the sleepover, which will include a meal, will be $50. That money will go to RCPD to support programs like DARE. For an additional $25, participants can bail themselves out of jail at any time.

Donor gives to Vet-Med

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine recently received a gift totaling more than $2 million from a woman who was impressed with the care given to her cat at the Veterinary Teaching Hospital more than nine years ago.

Louise C. Averill, Mission Hills, Kan., donated the money that will be used to establish a research chair dedicated to research in the area of Feline Infectious Peritonitis and related feline diseases.

"This is a wonderful gift to the college," said Dr. Ralph Richardson, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine. "Louise Averill has a sincere passion for animals and their well-being and, fortunately, she was in a position where she can help people who care about winning the battle against animal illnesses."

Averill decided to establish the chair after experiencing the loss of her Burmese cat to FIP. She had brought the cat to the Veterinary Teaching Hospital in hopes of receiving some type of treatment in the early 1990s. Although her cat could not be saved, she was impressed with the care the cat received and was concerned that so little was known about the disease.

Funding from Averill is underwriting two studies under way at the College of Veterinary Medicine.

The first study, headed by Dr. Sanjay Kapil, assistant professor of clinical virology, hopes to isolate the susceptibility factors within cats that lead to the development of FIP. Kapil said once it is determined which cats are most susceptible and at risk, vaccines can be administered more efficaciously.

"There is something in the host that triggers the illness," Kapil said. "We need to perfectly understand the biology of the virus and the host to find a weak link."

Kapil said this gift to the college is very important because of the lack of funding for illness prominent in cats and dogs.

"There is very little funding for those animals," he said. "There is quite a bit of money for the food and fiber animal research in agriculture, but hardly a red cent goes towards dogs and cats. This is a very big opportunity for us."

Dr. Robert Hunter said he agrees that the gift is important for disease research.

"There is not a lot of funding available for this disease and ones similar to it," Hunter said. "The gift is really going to help us expand our research into the field."

Hunter, along with co-investigators Dr. Ruthanne Chun and Dr. Heather Heeb, will head the second study that will take a pharmacological approach to treating FIP. They will study two different drugs as possible treatments.

FIP, which is prominent in household cats, is caused by the mutation of coronaviruses that attack the immune system. There is no cure for the fatal disease.

FIP manifests in two forms, wet and dry, which exhibit different symptoms in affected cats. In the wet form, fluid collects within the abdomen of the cat, causing a distended belly. The symptoms might be accompanied by diarrhea, anorexia, chronic fever and malaise. The dry form is harder to diagnose because the noticeable signs mimic those associated with other diseases.

Regents address Fort Hays merger

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

The Kansas Board of Regents could decide the fate of a possible precedent-setting merger between Pratt Community College and Fort Hays State University today in its monthly meeting.

If the merger — the first of its kind in Kansas — is voted on and passed, Pratt would release control of the operation of its campus to Fort Hays State but would remain the campus' landlord. Pratt would still be in charge of developing a budget for its campus, but it would be subject to review and approval by the regents.

"Currently, tuition at community colleges is set by the local board, and tuition at state colleges is set by the Board of Regents," Regent Floris Jean Hampton said. "If they merge, regents would set tuition for both, but Pratt Community College would maintain some control over spending and budgeting on campus."

"They have asked to maintain control of the campus, so they would still be in charge of maintenance of the campus, facilities and athletic programs. The education decisions would be made by the university and regents."

The final decision concerning academics would be made by regents, but Pratt trustees would remain as advisers on programs and services in the Pratt area, Hampton said.

The advantage of such an association is that Pratt

Bush's lead in Florida official

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

One week into America's election limbo, the secretary of state of Florida certified George W. Bush's fragile lead, even as thousands of disputed ballots were counted into the night at the behest of Al Gore.

"When is it going to end?" asked Bush aide James A. Baker III.

Baker floated a proposal to cease the ballot-by-ballot fight for Florida's 25 electoral votes and the White House, but Democrats said he offered nothing new — and dismissed it outright. With lawyers and judges front and center in the presidential election, nerves began to fray and adjectives failed to serve.

Secretary of State Katherine Harris, a Republican Bush supporter, announced Tuesday night that the Texas governor had

A business venture sponsored by Students for Environmental Action has put a new twist on the meaning of the traditional late-night study snack.

Today is America Recycles Day, and in recognition of the importance of recycling, K-State's chapter of Students for Environmental Action is selling re-used notebooks with covers made of cereal boxes at the K-State Student Union today.

Dozens of notebooks bearing a grinning Tony the Tiger, Snap, Crackle and Pop and covers from various other cereal boxes line a table outside the Union Food Court. SEA also sold the notebooks Tuesday.

"As soon as I set them out, there were two or three people already here asking about them," said Heather Hall, SEA vice president and junior in horticulture. "Their covers are made from cereal boxes and the pages inside are actually the backs of paper we got from campus computer labs and the copy center in the education department."

SEA plans a number of environmental awareness programs throughout the year, including an Earth Day festival in the spring. The money from the notebook sales most likely will go toward the festival.

The organization is also involved in an ongoing campus recycling project. Diana Sjogren, SEA member and senior in marketing and international business, said a number of plans are in the works for future projects.

"We have big plans for campus recycling. We would like to make recycle bins as accessible as trash cans," she said. "We would also like to hire an environmental coordinator to write for grants, promote recycling on campus and organize the placement of the collection of bins."

SEA members also walk through Bramlage Coliseum after every home football game and collect plastic bottles left behind by fans, said John Recycling facts:

1998-1999: 82 tons of material
1999-2000: 288 tons of material
2000-2001 as of Friday: 141 tons of material.

Woods, director of facilities and custodial services at K-State.

"A bale of recycled bottles will be outside the Union tomorrow so students will be able to see what happens to their old plastic bottles," Woods said.

A grant from the National Association of PET Container Resources and PepsiCola was given to SEA, and the money will go toward purchasing more recycling bins to place around K-State's campus.

SEA is asking members of the student body to sign a petition that eventually will be sent to the Student Governing Association. The petition asks SGA to increase student fees by $2 in order to generate funds to help pay for more recycling on campus.

Manhattan to investigate possibilities for growth

Manhattan could be looking at growth in the future, Mayor Karen McCulloh said.

A proposed development for Third Street would be for a retail district. Target is still a possibility for this area.

"Target has indicated an interest in coming to Manhattan," Diane Stoddard, assistant city manager, said.

Some residents think a store like Target would only encourage competition among the same types of businesses, but McCulloh said she disagrees.

"There's no question that, when people go to Topeka, Salina and Lawrence for their kids' soccer games or whatever, they go to Target and buy what they don't think they can get here," she said.

McCulloh said she thinks it's better for Manhattan to have businesses like Target rather than people going to other cities to shop.

In addition to Third Street, the city is considering other prospects.

Another proposed development is at the area north of McCall Road and south of Levee Drive. The district would be retail and possibly industrial.

"There's a huge need for industrial land in the city," Stoddard said.

She said the city was about to embark on an update to the comprehensive land use plan.

Manhattan, in conjunction with Riley County, will undergo a process next year to help identify where development is needed.

"It's a major process that looks at current land uses in the community and addresses issues on how we want to grow and where the appropriate places are," Stoddard said.

An ongoing development issue with the city is housing.

Manhattan doesn't have enough low-income housing, McCulloh said.

To help improve the situation, the city has developed the Community Housing Development Organization. It helps access other funds and gives developers tax incentives to build low income housing.

"Right now, a lot of exciting things could be happening," McCulloh said. "We're looking at development on every front."

Angelou signs contract with greeting-card line

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Poet and author Maya Angelou has signed an agreement with Hallmark Cards Inc. to develop a line of greeting cards, specialty gifts, journals and other products for Hallmark stores.

Hallmark predicts the Maya Angelou Collection will generate annual sales of $50 million after it hits stores in January 2002. Angelou said Monday that she likes the fit between Hallmark and herself.

"I feel about Hallmark the same way I feel about Reader's Digest or Quaker Oats," Angelou said. "These are the institutions which set standards and have not deviated from the best they could do ... I found this for myself and every year I work to not fail, to not let my standards fall. I think that's one of the things we have in common."

Southern Baptists affirm faith despite criticism

SAVANNAH, Ga. — Georgia Baptists voted Tuesday to affirm the new Southern Baptist statement of faith, shrugging off criticism from former President Jimmy Carter and others unhappy with language that says the Bible is without error and women should not serve as pastors.

The statement was criticized by Carter when he announced last month that he was breaking with the Southern Baptist Convention over its increasingly rigid creed. Texas Baptists last month also weakened their ties to the national denomination over its conservative shift.

The new Baptist Faith and Message was passed by the Southern Baptist Convention — America's largest Protestant denomination, with 15.8 million members — in June.

Delegates at Tuesday's meeting of the Georgia Baptist Convention held up cards showing their vote. No formal count was taken, but convention officials said about 75 percent of the 3,447 delegates voted in favor.

The Georgia convention's president, the Rev. William Ricketts, supported the statement of faith but said he hopes Georgia Baptists stay unified.

"I hope no church would feel disenfranchised because they did not get the vote they were looking for," Ricketts said.

The convention's vote is not binding on local churches.

Isuzu recalling vehicles upon finding fuel leak

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Isuzu Motors Ltd. is recalling some 2000 and 2001 model year Troopers after the sport utility vehicle leaked fuel in crash tests by an insurance industry group.

The recall affects 18,460 vehicles — all 2000 Troopers with four-wheel drive and 2001 models with four-wheel drive that were produced before the problem was discovered.

"There have been no reports of any incidents in the field, but any fuel leak is of concern to us and should be addressed," said Terry Maloney, vice president of corporate relations for Isuzu.

The Troopers leaked fuel in two of three front crash tests conducted by the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, which released the results Tuesday. Fuel leaks are considered a serious problem because they can result in a fire

In the first test conducted on a 2000 Trooper on June 21, a fuel line separated. Isuzu engineers found a design problem and issued a voluntary recall of the 2000 vehicles.

The automaker sent a letter to vehicle owners and dealers and the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration on Sept. 21 but did not announce the recall to the media.

The institute conducted a second test the day after the recall, using a 2001 model with the new fuel-line design. The fuel hose tore, causing a second leak, and Isuzu issued another recall to cover 2001 models Monday.

There was no fuel leak in the institute's third test Nov. 2, but the organization still gave the vehicle a marginal rating, largely because of poor bumper performance and injuries measured on a crash-test dummy's legs.

Complete testing results and crash video can be accessed at www.progressive.com.

LOVE OF THE ARTS

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan Arts Center executive director Tish Rogers does not feel 50 years old.

"I am such a kid," Rogers said. "I still have so many things to do and I do not feel my age at all."

Rogers, who has been executive director of the MAC for eight months, said that when she came to Manhattan her main goal was to involve children in the arts more.

"I just love children. I am still a child myself," Rogers said. "I am the most proud of the MAC truck I started, which gives about 15,000 children a month the capability to do art projects."

Growing up in the Manhattan community, Rogers was able to develop a keen sense for many different types of arts. She said after she attended college at both the University of Kansas and K-State, she became involved with politics and worked to bring arts to the forefront of government.

"The arts are poorly funded, and no one really realizes it," Rogers said. "When I was working as Governor Bob Bennett's administrative assistant, I got the brown bag concerts started at the capitol building. I think things like that are important to a community."

Rogers is working to involve the Manhattan community in all types of arts. From the Thursday Live concerts in the MAC parking lot to performing arts series, Rogers said she has been trying to make the MAC something all Manhattan residents can utilize.

"We have everything from children's classes after school to theater and exhibits in the gallery," Rogers said. "I want people to realize all that we have to offer."

Rogers said although she wants everyone to become involved with the MAC, she reaches out to children the most because she believes it is important for them to be exposed to the arts.

"The creative sense does so much for a child's self esteem," she said. "I think that it is the look in a child's eyes when they paint something wonderful or when they perform and hear all the applause."

Rogers said she wanted to get children involved because there no longer is funding for arts programs in elementary schools and many students do not have the exposure.

"With the MAC truck and the after school programs, we are able to give lots of children opportunities they would not normally have," Rogers said. "I think it is very important for children to get involved at a young age. Not all kids are going to be the doctors and the lawyers. Lots of kids are going to be the actors, directors, painters and writers."

Rogers said she has been happy with what she has brought to the Manhattan community in her eight months as MAC director.

"I love the people that I work with, although I think I may be hard to work for," Rogers said. "I just expect a lot of people and I am always on the go and excited."

Lucas Rice, assistant technical director of the MAC and sophomore in public relations and theater, said working with Rogers is a valuable experience.

"Working here is full-fledged exciting," Rice said. "It is an ongoing job to keep this place running, but Tish makes working here exciting and fun."

Dustin Babitzke, facilities manager of the MAC and junior in marketing, said the MAC was not really known within the community until Rogers became director.

"Tish has changed this place a lot," Babitzke said. "The MAC is more known than ever now, and Tish has really brought a lot of people to this place."

Rogers said she has had to make a transition since she has been in Manhattan because it is different from the larger cities where she has worked.

"Manhattan is a much more intellectual community," she said. "There are a variety of arts here with both the community and the university.

Manhattan is fortunate that K-State does not just sit there with an ivory tower perspective. K-State and Manhattan are full-on partners in every aspect."

Rogers said she has enjoyed her time working for the MAC thus far and plans to develop the MAC even further—especially with children's programs.

"Every part of the community is important to me," she said. "I think it is important for everyone to see what there is out there for them, but I especially want children to learn how to express themselves. I want children to understand that it is OK to color outside the lines."

Business honor group creates volunteer bookBy APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

The obvious volunteering options aren't always the best, according to five students in the College of Business Administration's Honors Program.

The group of students developed a Riley County Area Community Service Booklet for a class project that contains basic information and contacts for more than 30 organizations that accept volunteers.

Aaron Rodehorst, junior in finance, said the group wanted to make information about volunteer opportunities more readily available to students.

"Sometimes students just pick an obvious organization because they don't know where to look," Rodehorst said. "These organizations are great to volunteer with if you're interested in what they do, but many times students aren't as interested in them as they would be another."

The fair, Rodehorst said, is a great opportunity to get information, but those who would like to volunteer cannot all attend.

"We were concerned that students who missed the fair would have to dig on their own to get this information," Rodehorst said. "We just centralized it."

The group assembled the booklet from the files in the Academic and Career Information Center. The resource file contained information about agencies that attend the fair to recruit volunteers. They also contacted additional organizations and helped the ACIC reorganize their current information.

The booklet was created and distributed to the ACIC, Career and Employment Center and many other offices on campus.

"We wanted the booklet distributed so students could get it," Rodehorst said. "Putting it online allows students easy access at their convenience."

Agencies that accept volunteers as well as offices on campus who help students find volunteer work were included. Career and Employment Services, which coordinates the volunteer fair each year, was included in the booklet.

Tim Henderson, assistant director of Career and Employment Services, said the most identifiable way they help students get involved in volunteering is the volunteer fair.

Henderson said Career and Employment Services takes information collected from agencies at the fair and provides a directory for students.

"We keep in contact with the agencies and keep information updated so it is accurate when students want it," Henderson said.

Career and Employment Services, Henderson said, encourages students to volunteer with an agency that they are interested in and stick to it.

"We definitely think quality is more important than quantity," he said. "Some students volunteer at many organizations for a few hours so they can put it on their résumé. We think a more long-term commitment is much more beneficial to students and the organizations."

ACIC is another campus organization included in the community service booklet as an office that helps students get involved.

ACIC coordinator Tinsley Furry said the ACIC also uses information collected from the volunteer fair and organizes it so students know which agencies recruit volunteers and who to contact from the agency.

"We try to help students find something they have a particular interest in," Furry said. "The experience may be more meaningful for both parties if the student volunteering has a connection with the organization and people he is serving."

Volunteering is a way for students to build their résumés. However, Furry said, students shouldn't overlook the other benefits from getting involved.

"Becoming a volunteer enables individuals to hone and further develop transferable skills that can be used in the workplace," Furry said.

Campus group deserves credit for recycling

The Students for Environmental Action deserve to be recognized for reminding students about America Recycles Day. SEA is selling re-used notebooks with covers that are made out of cereal boxes at the K-State Student Union today.

Another key component of the group is that it is involved in an ongoing campus recycling project. The members also collect plastic bottles left by the fans after every home football game.

However, there are things every individual can do to help with recycling, such as buying products that are made from recycled materials. There are notebooks, paper, containers and other objects that can be resourceful and are made from previously used products. These products might be a little more expensive, but they definitely are worth the added expense and will continue to be in the long run.

We encourage everyone to set up recycling areas in their own house. It does not have to be anything drastic, but there are so many things that could be recycled if people would just take the time and effort to do so. Even this Collegian can be recycled after you read it. Your Pepsi-Cola bottles or cans on campus, or perhaps Coca-Cola bottles or cans off campus, also can be recycled.

The members of the SEA have done a fantastic job to promote not only awareness but more importantly, action.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

The Missouri game is a must-win — otherwise the Nebraska win would be for naught.

For the love of God, please fix the crosswords so I don't have to actually listen to my professors in class.

Is it just me, or are they finally blocking Napster?

Will learning in detail all the insides of a squid really help me later in life? I don't think so.

Have you been trying to sabotage my education? The crossword is the only thing I learn from in some classes.

Does anyone else here read letters to the editor written by people from Lincoln, Nebraska? Yeah, I didn't think so.

It says here that the city is going to stiffen the laws on the noise ordinance. Does that mean that we don't have to hear the garbage trucks at 5 o'clock, or are the police going to still discriminate against students?

I doubt you'll hear a single complaint if you move Lafene to Sunset now that you have promised to tear down Denison. Go for it.

Any team that beats Nebraska has the automatic worst fans. Ask Oklahoma, ask Texas, ask anyone.

Good column today, Clint. I particularly like your quips about the engineering department.

I just want to thank the maintenance crew at Haymaker for the wake-up call. There is nothing like the sound of jackhammers dancing through the ceiling.

Well, if moving Lafene to Sunset means tearing down Denison, then I'm all for it.

love

Paper's foibles, triumphs all in day's work

What a week, huh? It's times like this that I love my job.

Yeah, in addition to contributing a weekly space-filler on page 4, I'm also the online editor of the Collegian. It's great because I'm not a journalist — but I get to hang around one of the best assembled groups of collegiate journalists in the world. Maybe this sounds like idle flattery, but after this weekend they've got the hardware to prove it, so nyeh. Of course, they've also got the bleary eyes and poisoned livers for additional proof.

It's vogue to rip this humble rag. Sometimes it's even deserved. For every hundred things this paper does right, the occasional stupid blunder seeps through to the page. They — we can't help that. We do our glorious best.

But it's an invariable human truth — we will never remember the monotonous parade of mistake-free articles and columns. Once you see something wrong irreparably printed on over 10,000 newspapers, that flaw attracts your eyes like a magnet until you can't see anything else in the paper. Trust me, I know the feeling.

We don't remember the feel-good press-release news bites about our personal favorite organizations, we remember them getting dogged in the press. We don't remember the rah-rah purple pride columns, we remember inflammatory columns that get columnists attacked. It's sad, but it's human nature, and we know it happens. And the editorial staff walks a fine line between objective presentation and burning bridges, knowing full well that a perfectly well-written and factually-based story sometimes will alienate its subjects to the point that they refuse to speak to that reporter — or the entire newspaper — making work even harder. Sometimes it's a calculated risk.

And sometimes it's utterly accidental. Sometimes slips of the tongue (are they still slips of the tongue if they're in print? No? How about "turns of a phrase?") have connotations we simply don't intend. Or we accidentally will overlook a group's favorite event and incur its unrelenting wrath. All of this has happened before, and it all will happen again.

The funny thing is that this newspaper has no responsibility beyond that to the truth and its readers. There are things this publication's readers need to know, and everyone — from the adviser (who stays out of the copy chain, giving students full responsibility for what you read, bless his soul) to editor in chief to the desk editors to the field reporters — is part of the mission to faithfully relate that information.

Sometimes we screw up. Everyone does. The difference is that when you misspell someone's name, you don't often have tens of thousands of people read it and e-mail you attacking you. You don't have irate people calling you simply to vent and chew "someone" out over a headline in the newspaper (for future reference, people, it's a good idea to (a) read the newspaper first, (b) have the newspaper in front of you and (c) talk to someone who might somehow be responsible for the "error" and not the online editor, thank you very much). And you don't have to take it with a civil tone of voice while chewing on your bottom lip 'til it bleeds.

Those are most of the days at the paper. Work, make a 99-percent perfect newspaper, get hammered at for that painful 1 percent, and try again the next day. Then there's the ritual self-abuse, which can be tobacco or alcohol or painful perfectionism or country music (For me it's sleep deprivation).

Once in a great, great while there's a week like last week. The Collegian sent two teams, one to Tennessee and one to Texas, to cover election hype and (in theory) concession/acceptance speeches. Obviously, things went a little haywire, but they kept their ground, sending in Collegian exclusives from a time I don't think few of us will ever forget. Our four vigilant journalists in the field — Nick Bratkovic, Nancy Foster, Steven Dearing and Evan Semon — as well as those who tolled back in Manhattan to prevent the Collegian from committing a front-page "Dewey Defeats Truman" sin which would have haunted all involved forever, gave the best part of themselves into a collection of ink and dead trees. They monitored chat rooms and CNN for breaking news. They had copy editors working at 5 a.m. They blew more deadlines than they wanted — than they could count.

And they came back to work the next day.

Some work for practical experience. Nobody works for the pay. But those that worked Tuesday night/Wednesday morning look at that newspaper and see something nobody else can — something that you can't articulate, a rare moment of pride in doing the best job a staff can do when acting as one. It's something that makes those 364 days of ritual abuse completely tolerable. Bring 'em on.

The Collegian is taking applications until this Friday. You don't need to be a journalist; I'm not. You don't need to be enrolled in a journalism class or be an upperclassman. If you're willing to put your soul and well-being on the line for dregs of a paycheck and scorn from all who read the newspaper, then you've got what it takes. Swing by Kedzie Hall and pick up an application.

It hurts like holy hell, but in the end, it's life well-lived.

BECKY WILSON/Collegian

Media misinformation harms election results

If you get a penalty flag in football, you must walk backwards down the field. If you get a foul in basketball, your opponent gets free throws and you are limited in your mistakes to four before disqualification. If you are a journalist covering an election, you can make as many mistakes as you want and the people who are penalized are the American public.

While I was at the State Republican Watch Party in Topeka last Election Day, I heard Al Gore had been declared the winner in Florida. Because nobody was running for governor or senator in Kansas this year, there was no free beer or wine for us to warm our souls. My guest and I departed for a friend's house in town to sit out what was sure to be the inevitable. Bottles of Bud were shared by all.

By the time I returned to Manhattan at 2 a.m., I was greeted once again by a shocked Dan Rather who now was declaring George W. Bush the winner in Florida, giving him the necessary electoral votes to become the 43rd president of this fine country. I should've gone to bed at that point because later that night Florida was again deemed too close to call.

By Sunday, New Mexico also was declared too close to call after it had been put in the Gore column on Election Day. I wondered what could possibly be next. Could it somehow be that the next news report would say that Nebraska scored a late field goal on Saturday after the goal posts had been torn down? I was relieved when Dan Rather didn't mention our game on Monday's evening news.

It would be noble of me to write a column about this year's election without noting the voting controversy in Florida, but I have no blue in my blood. I just have to say that if the people of Palm Beach county can't figure out a ballot that has arrows pointing right and left, I hope they took a cab to the polls.

There are too many things wrong with this situation, the foremost of which is the consortium of news networks called the Voter News Service. It is because of their reporting that Al Gore was declared the winner of the Sunshine State before the lights were out in all of the Florida polls. Withstanding the problems with exit polling and early winner declaration, is there a good reason why we have to know who won Florida or Pennsylvania or any other state on the very night of the election?

I think that there should be a general announcement of the winner no earlier than the Sunday after the election. We all could gather around our televisions like we were watching if we would make a Bowl Championship Series game in 1997, or if our basketball team might be lucky enough to play in the NIT. For the first time in history, sports bars would focus on C-Span.

Sports and politics do share many similarities. The game is never over until the last second ticks off the clock or until all of the polls close. Sometimes it is beneficial for the players of one game not to know the results of another game. I was one of the many Wildcat faithful in attendance at 1998's Big 12 Championship game in St. Louis. Soon after it was announced that UCLA had lost to Miami, virtually ensuring our place in the National Championship game, our team crumbled like month-old wedding cake and we would wind up playing in the Alamo Bowl.

It was obvious that the announcement about that game played in Florida had an effect on our game being played many miles to the west.

It also is true that those on the West Coast often are apathetic about voting because by the time they get off of work to go and vote someone already has been declared the national winner. It would be hard for a Bush voter to get motivated to take an extra hour or more to vote when it already was announced that Gore had won Florida, Pennsylvania, and Michigan.

I don't believe that legislation is necessary in order to preserve the sanctity of our national elections. Such an attempt by our government would infringe on the rights of free speech by the voters, exit pollers and the entire media. But the media itself should respect the right of the American people to have an election free from the problems of misinformation. There is little regulation of the networks by the FCC, but they should be reminded that they use the public airwaves free of charge and with that mandate comes the responsibility of reporting fairly and accurately.

Like all of you, I don't know who is ultimately going to win this contest, nor do I know if the outcome would've been any different had the election coverage been more accurate. What I do know is that it ain't over 'til it's over, but we're already in overtime and my team lost the last one in St. Louis.

Too bad Florida's state quarter won't be released until 2004, that way we could just flip their coin and decide this thing already.

Union offers events, specials for National Children's Book Week

By ALLISON RUSHTON
Kansas State Collegian

This week marks the 81st annual observance of the Children Book Council's National Children's Book Week.

The K-State Union Bookstore is participating with events and discounts for children and adults throughout the week.

Derek Tingstrom, junior in park resources management and employee of the bookstore, said the purpose of Children's Book Week, which takes place annually the week before Thanksgiving, is to promote literacy and to encourage children to read more.

"It gives us an opportunity to share books with children," Tingstrom said. "Also, it lets them see what types of books are available to them here in the store."

Von O'Neil, general book buyer at the bookstore, said the store has a permanent children's book area, and until Friday all children's books that are in stock will be sold at a 25-percent discount.

O'Neil also said this year the theme of Children's Book Week is celebrating the birthday of Raggedy Ann and Andy.

"Every store or library across the nation has a different theme," O'Neil said. "Since this year marks the 85th anniversary of the Raggedy Ann and Andy series, we thought it would be an appropriate and fun theme."

Tingstrom said the bookstore is trying to localize the event this year by inviting daycare organizations and classes from area elementary schools to come in for scheduled readings.

O'Neil said this year's theme is incorporated into the story times by reading aloud several Raggedy Ann and Andy books, along with other selections.

She said cookies are served and activity books are passed out during the readings as well.

While the readings have been scheduled for specific groups, O'Neil said anyone is welcome to come.

The remaining story times for this week are at 9:30 a.m., 1 p.m. and 1:30 p.m. today.

"Those are our only scheduled readings," O'Neil said. "But if someone else comes in and wants to hear a story, I'll read to them."

Former skinhead speaks out against violence in UPC-sponsored speech

By COLLEEN FOOTE
Kansas State Collegian

What goes around comes around, according to a former skinhead leader.

Frank Meeink, a former a skinhead leader and neo-Nazi recruiter, presented "A Former Skinhead Speaks Out Against Hate," Tuesday night in the Union Main Ballroom, sponsored by the Union Program Council.

Meeink, 25, told the audience a part of his life story, beginning at age 13 when he became a skinhead in south Philadelphia. Meeink became aware of the group through his cousin, a skinhead member.

"The skinheads stood out from everybody else," Meeink said. "They all dressed alike, and they all wore Doc Marten shoes, and I wanted to be like them."

By age 18, Meeink had traveled the country as a skinhead leader and recruiter. He and other members of his gang would attack people and videotape their torture.

If a member of the gang killed someone, then he or she would earn a spider-web tattoo in recognition of the murder.

"Violence gives you an image," Meeink said, while displaying his arm full of tattoos earned for acts of violence to the audience.

"Anything I never thought about or knew about, I hated."

In Springfield, Ill., he received his own cable-access TV show, "The Reich." The show talked about the importance of a separation of races. During the show, the gang averaged two to three new members a day.

Meeink was eventually arrested and convicted of kidnapping and beating a member of a member of a rival skinhead gang.

"Prison changed my life in many ways," Meeink said. "I met people of different races who became my family because we always stood together and protected each other."

After prison, Meeink realized he could not go back to his old skinhead ways because he could not bring himself to hate his new friends.

A Jewish man was the first person to give Meeink a job after prison, even though neo-Nazi tattoos covered his body.

According to Meeink, the man was one of the first Jews he had ever met and befriended.

"This Jewish guy told me one day that I was one of the smartest people he knew," Meeink said. "After he said that, I took my boots off, started growing my hair, and I changed my life for good."

Meeink realized he had to do something to help stop hate groups. He decided to start reaching out to those who could fall prey to skinheads. He now speaks out against hate groups and shares their way of thinking and recruitment with others.

Meeink is the founder of the Hockey for Harmony Foundation, which encourages youth of all races to play hockey and help prevent them from joining gangs.

"Speaking out against violence and skinheads made me finally feel like I was doing something positive," Meeink said.

Many students who witnessed Meeink's message thought it was a wonderful and educational experience.

"I thought his speech was awesome and motivational," said Lindsay Strader, freshman in exercise and nutritional science. "His message impacts a lot of people."

Mike Katzif, freshman in music, said he thought the speech was interesting because it was a true-life story.

"He told it about it all, from his rough beginning in Philadelphia to finally succeeding in the end," Katzif said.

Even though Meeink is often threatened, he is committed to his message and spends much of his time speaking on behalf of the Anti-Defamation League and works to eliminate hate propaganda.

He is dedicated to the idea that nobody is better or worse than anybody else.

"Whatever you put out will always come back to you," Meeink said.

"Treat each other with respect and you will be treated with that same respect."

consistency CONCERNS

Men's exhibition season ends with close loss

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Jim Wooldridge said Tuesday night's 97-96 loss to the California All-Stars left him with a handful of concerns.

"I'm worried about where we are, but if you put yourself in my position I think you'd be worried, too. We are so new at everything, and correcting mistakes doesn't necessarily take place overnight.

"If we're correcting the same mistakes a week from now, then we really are taking a step back."

Wooldridge said many of those mistakes are subtleties of offense that a team must perform, such as identifying good shot selection and developing an inside game.

However, several of K-State's offensive inconsistencies Tuesday pointed to something more simplistic.

"What it looked like to me, where I was sitting, we missed a lot of layups to begin with," he said, "and I told our kids at halftime that I thought we really performed offensively very poorly in terms of execution."

That lack of execution in the first 20 minutes resulted in the All-Stars' 55-42 halftime lead.

Nevertheless, the Cats clawed back midway through the second stanza. With 11 and a half minutes to play in the game, K-State began what would amount to a 15-4 run, knotting the game at 85 with just more than three minutes left in regulation.

Wooldridge said his team was making better offensive choices after the intermission.

"We made some more layups that were given to us," he said. "We shot the ball with a little more accuracy in the second half, but I don't know that our execution was any better than it was in the first half."

Yet, miscommunication on a free-throw attempt with 21 seconds on the clock proved the deciding factor in the contest.

With the All-Stars' leading 94-91, Cat forward Travis Reynolds fouled guard Curtis

Staples, sending him to the line to shoot a 1-and-1.

When Staples missed the shot, though, All-Star forward Roy Hairston was the only one to step in the lane for the rebound, and subsequently, the put-back.

"Well, I don't know what happened,"

Wooldridge said. "If you noticed, only one player moved, and he was the lucky one. He came up with the ball and put it back in."

"Our guys are saying that the official said, 'two shots,' and the official said he said it was a 1-and-1 situation. So we either didn't hear it right, or certainly we didn't react right to it."

Forward Matt Siebrandt added a dunk with seven seconds remaining to cut the lead to 96-93, but a Rumeal Robinson free-throw extended the All-Stars lead to four.

In turn, transfer Larry Reid's desperation three-pointer at the buzzer couldn't complete the comeback, as the score ended 97-96.

Siebrandt said he was disappointed in the loss even though it was just an exhibition game.

"It was frustrating," he said. "The crowd was getting into it, and I know the crowd wanted to see a win as much as we wanted to see a win. And we almost had them, but that's how things work."

Part of that outcome resulted in the Cats' lack of intensity as well, junior transfer Phineas Atchison said.

"We need to be intense all the time. With no intensity, it's going to be kind of hard to come out with a win," he said.

As a result, Wooldridge said he was concerned, but not without a sense of optimism.

"I'm concerned, but I think we'll come through and improve — and that's what we're trying to do is get better," Wooldridge said. "We'll see if we can make some improvements in our ball club and try to find some more answers in our ball club in the next few days."

"We'll see how we stack up Saturday night."

K-State opens the regular season Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum with a 7 p.m. tip-off versus Texas-San Antonio.

3-pointers area of focus for team

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's defense watched for the second straight game as an opposing player lit up the scoreboard with three-pointers after three-pointers.

Last week it was Michael Nurse who drained eight treys, and Tuesday night the sharpshooter was the California All-Stars' Curtis Staples, a University of Virginia alumnus who drained 5-of-6 threes in the first half. The team finished with 11 for the game.

The Cats' inability to defend the three was, with the team's poor offensive execution, one of the two most pressing concerns in the game, head coach Jim

K-State signs Arizona golfer for 2001-02

Women's golf coach Kristi Knight announced Tuesday the first member of the Wildcats' 2001-02 recruiting class.

Sarah Heffel, a senior at Mountain View High School in Mesa, Ariz., has signed a national letter of intent to play golf for the Wildcats.

Heffel has been named all-region four times and all-state three times during her prep career, while also earning American Junior Golf Association Compaq Academic All-American honors in 1999.

"We are excited to be adding a player and a person like Sarah to our roster next season," Knight said. "She is an excellent student and brings a great deal of competitive experience."

Coach says Crouch played while injured

LINCOLN, Neb. — Nebraska quarterback Eric Crouch, who had a miserable passing performance last week against K-State, has a sore throwing shoulder.

"Eric has had some things that have been bothersome to him that he's played through this entire season," Nebraska coach Frank Solich said Monday.

"I think he's done a remarkable job with all that he's had to handle on that end of it."

Crouch has a sore joint in his right shoulder, which was operated on after last season. He was 2-for-13 for 39 yards in the Cornhuskers' 29-28 loss to K-State on Saturday.

On Monday, Solich gave the Cornhuskers the day off.

Conference connection

The California All-Stars had two former Big 12 players on their roster. Forward Ashante Johnson played under Roy Williams at Kansas, while forward/center Renzi Stone was an Oklahoma Sooner. Each completed their college eligibility last spring.

Turbulent tour

K-State's loss Tuesday was only the second win for the California All-Stars in nine games so far in their college exhibition tour. The All-Stars' only other win came Monday, a 74-72 defeat of Wichita State at Levitt Arena.

Injury report

Guards Galen Morrison (sprained ankle) and Kerry Darting (sprained foot) both missed Tuesday's game with injuries. Head coach Jim Wooldridge said Morrison is still questionable for the season opener this Saturday night versus Texas-San Antonio.

Meanwhile, center Kelvin Howell played 20 minutes against the California All-Stars, despite only practicing one day due to a foot injury since the Cats' Oct. 6 exhibition game.

Forward Quentin Buchanan also chipped in 18 minutes for K-State on Tuesday, in spite of being reported as questionable prior to the contest after suffering a blister.

K-State prepares to face Oklahoma squad

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team will look to extend a four-game winning streak tonight against Oklahoma at Ahearn Field House.

All the focus will be on the No. 24 Cats, as Oklahoma has struggled the entire season. In fact, in the two teams' last meeting in Norman, K-State easily defeated the Sooners in three games. Despite the obvious mismatch in competition, the Cats still have prepared for Oklahoma like they would any other team, setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"You hear a lot of players and a lot of coaches all the time say they prepare for everybody the same way," she said. "It's really the absolute truth. We have to prepare for OIU the way we prepare for Nebraska and the way we prepare for Texas Tech."

"Heading into the end of the season the way we are, we have to treat everybody the same. It's getting

Struggling Chiefs likely out of playoffs

It's starting to get to the point that I don't even need a calendar anymore. You can tell easily enough when winter has arrived by turning on the television to see the Kansas City Chiefs busily squandering opportunities against a beatable team down the home stretch.

Ah, another year, another playoff dream smothered by the Chiefs. Sunday's painful 21-7 loss to the San Francisco 49ers killed whatever infinitesimal chance the Chiefs had left of winning the AFC Western Division title and made even a wild-card playoff berth improbable. Again.

The worst part is that just two weeks ago, life looked downright swell if you were a Chiefs fan. The new, improved Elvis Grbac was passing out touchdown tosses like they were complementary breath mints. The young defense was clamping down on opponents like a Rottweiler. Tony Gonzalez was taking the Harlem Globetrotters' approach to football — humiliating overmatched defensive backs in ever more magical and creative ways.

That was before the Raiders exposed the Kansas City defense two weeks ago. Rich Gannon toyed with K.C.'s young defensive backs all day long. Tyrone Wheatley shrugged off "hits" from K.C.'s front seven as though he were running through the Vienna Boys Choir. Despite 500+ passing yards from Grbac, Oakland won by a not-as-close-as-it-sounds tally of 49-31.

But they still had that high-octane offense in their favor, right? No, not so much. Coming into Saturday's game, the 49ers had the worst defense in the NFL. The worst. Yes, even worse than the Bengals.

And that defense kept the Chiefs to one meaningless garbage-time touchdown in a 21-7 San Francisco win. The defense was its usual putrid self as well, allowing 389 yards, including 149 on the ground, to an ordinary Frisco offense.

So where does this leave Kansas City, playoffs-wise? On the outside looking in is my guess. For our mental and emotional health, we Chiefs fans had better get to work now on coping with another playoff-free season. Are the Chiefs as bad as they played the past two weekends? Nope. But neither are they nearly as good as they looked in consecutive morale-boosting, fan-energizing wins over Seattle and St. Louis.

The fact is, other than Grbac and the receiving corps, Kansas City doesn't have a single unit strong enough to win consistently in the NFL. The offensive line is pedestrian, and the running backs are less than that.

Defensively, the Chiefs' youth is showing. The veteran players on their line are overpaid and undervalued, and the young studs aren't yet ready to take up all of their slack. Their defensive backs struggle in man coverage, usually having to align somewhere in the next county to have a chance.

And we won't even talk special teams. My mother taught me if you can't say something nice, don't say anything at all.

So for the rest of this season, I'll cheer for the Chiefs as always, but I'm not expecting much out of them. The potential is there. They might surprise a team or two down the stretch.

Who knows? Next year, the Chiefs could be a very good team. Their youngsters are struggling right now, but they could mature into excellent NFL players. Grbac, Gonzalez and company are keepers. But for this year once again, Chiefs fans, it looks like they'll be on the outside looking in come playoff time.

But take heart. Next year is a new beginning. Besides, if the Chiefs don't make the playoffs in the first place, they can't choke in the first round, right?

Speaker shares experiences of foreign adoption

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Soft Chinese music and a slide show featuring small Chinese children at play set the scene Tuesday evening in Forum Hall for Laura Cecere to present a lecture on international adoptions.

Cecere is the founder and director of the China Seas adoption program that was established in 1992. Through this program she has helped more than 120 families with adoptions.

Cecere has first-hand knowledge of the adoption program in China, because she has adopted two daughters. She also has assisted in developing China's current law and policy on foreign adoption and wrote a book on China's emerging model of inter-country adoption titled "The Children Can't Wait."

"There are currently 100 to 140,000 orphans in custody in China," Cecere said. "Ten percent of that population are healthy infant girls."

She said the others are handicapped or disabled in some way. They will stay in an institute until they reach the age of 18, and then they will try and enter the community or they will have to stay in the institute for life.

Cecere explained the cultural aspects of having children as reasons for the abandonment of so many children in China.

"Only male heirs could inherit and worship the ancestor," she said. "Those unable to have children could adopt a son from within their extended family."

Cecere said daughters were not significant at this point in time because they would marry and take what money they got to their husbands' families. At this time, orphaned children were taken in by other families.

As the adoption policies changed, so did the reasons

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

for abandonment.

Cecere said in the 20th century, the state began taking responsibility for orphans. Adoption is now allowed domestically with more leniency towards foreign nations. She said the Chinese take very seriously the care and love of their children, and they feel it would be better for them to go to foreign homes than to stay in orphanages.

Cecere said adoptive parents have INS and a social worker's approval before presenting paperwork to the Chinese government.

Cecere also said Americans are more interested in Chinese adoptions than any other form of adoption for numerous reasons.

"Chinese babies are healthy and well cared for. There is a short waiting period, about eight months after paperwork is to China officials. The biological parents are untraceable, and they can adopt girls," Cecere said. "The biggest reason is the Chinese adoption agencies consider single parents, older couples and those who already have children."

She said the American adoption agencies will not accept these types of candidates.

Cecere said last year 5,000 Chinese children were adopted by Americans. She said that was 85 percent of the total number of children adopted from China.

Audience members were interested in the cost of a Chinese adoption. Cecere said most of the cost was the travel expense and that only a $3,000 donation to the orphanage was required.

Stacia Wood, sophomore in elementary education, said she was amazed at the way the Chinese government handled adoptions.

"I did not realize they restricted the number of children adopted out of the country each year," Wood said. "There are so many people that want to adopt children."

Linda Teener, director of UFM, said she was interested in the policies and cultural circumstances involved in putting children in orphanages.

"I was most impressed with the care and attention they get in relation to our foster care system," Teener said. "They recognize the developmental needs of children early on and work with a large number of kids to support those needs."

"Make no mistake," Cecere said. "We are rescuing these children from a marginal life of poverty and isolation and giving them a chance to thrive and blossom and be everything they are supposed to be."

Close election count could affect Congress

By ALAN FRAM
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Battered by the drawn-out election recount and facing a divided public and Congress, the next president will have a rugged but not impossible task of governing the country, Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott said Tuesday.

"It will be tough," Lott, R-Miss., said. "The American people are clearly divided" between Republican George W. Bush and Democrat Al Gore.

Lott said it was possible that if Bush wins the White House, Democrats might "set out from day one to undermine his presidency. Or conversely, will the Republicans be able to accept Gore as a legitimate president? All of that we don't know. And it could go either way."

But, he said, "My attitude is once the decision's made, the decision's made, even if it's one of questionable circumstances. We've got to move on, and I think we have to find a way to work together."

Underlining his point that a narrowly elected president can be effective, Lott noted that his own office on the Capitol's second floor was where the House met in 1801 when the federal government first moved to Washington. In that very room in February 1801, the House took 36 ballots before finally electing Thomas Jefferson as president over Aaron Burr.

Lott's comments seemed to reflect his instincts as one of Congress' premier dealmakers and the reality that, at best, Republicans will have a 51-49 Senate edge next year — hardly enough to dominate the agenda. In the final undecided Senate race, Republican Sen. Slade Gorton of Washington state had a 12,500-vote lead over Democratic challenger Maria Cantwell with 316,000 votes to be counted.

Lott himself is considered likely to hold onto the majority leader's post in the 107th Congress that convenes in January, though there are rumblings of discontent among his GOP colleagues.

Since he became leader in 1996, Republicans have gone from dreaming of reaching a filibuster-proof 60-seat Senate majority to clinging to control of the chamber. And though a conservative at heart, some other conservatives view with suspicion Lott's penchant for cutting deals on bills large and small, while some moderates feel the Senate has not been productive enough under his tenure.

Despite these divisions, Lott said the president and Congress might band together next year for some accomplishments.

"In a strange way, I think people may strive harder to make it work, to get a few good things done," he said. "Why not? The country is at stake. Why wouldn't we want to try to do a few big issues, just to show — if nothing else — that it can be done, or maybe because they are worried that chaos is not good for anybody."

Lott said the likeliest possible accomplishments include overhauling Medicare, providing some type of prescription drug benefits for the elderly, giving managed-care patients more rights and cutting taxes. All these areas were election-year issues on which the two parties shared some broad ideas but battled over specifics.

He seemed to downplay the chances that Bush's proposed $1.3 trillion, 10-year tax cut would survive intact. Considering the GOP's small majorities, many political observers have said the mammoth proposal stands little chance of passage without being significantly trimmed.

"After he's had a chance to scrub his proposal, there would be a serious effort to achieve that," Lott said. He added it would be "maybe not quite that big, but I think it's too early to say."

their use of quicks, which are hits by the middle blocker that can catch a defense by surprise and throw off its rhythm. Whether it will be enough for an Oklahoma victory is in question, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"I'm worried about them a little bit. They've got some people that can get it going. They like to try to use a lot of quicks," he said. "If we put the pressure on them, I don't know if they'll last long enough. I don't know if they can run enough quicks to beat us."

Bronnenberg said she agreed that the K-State defense can handle Oklahoma's offensive strategy.

"Our system allows us to touch a lot of quicks and to do some good things. I don't think we'll change the K-State way a whole lot," she said.

Still, the Cats will have to be ready to play their best to keep Oklahoma from pulling off the upset. The Sooners might have played inconsistently all season, but the Cats don't want that to change tonight, McLaughlin said.

"I don't want them to have the one night when they're consistent against us," he said.

That shouldn't happen, though. K-State's defense has gotten better each match, and is now playing well, outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"We've really been working on our defensive positioning, and it's paying off. We've also been working on our eyes and seeing things," she said. "We've been watching some tape from us playing earlier and comparing it to now. We're seeing things and we're reacting a lot faster than we were earlier."

"We're digging more balls, and we're touching more balls on the blocks. It's really gotten a lot better."

If the Cats continue to play well defensively and offensively against Oklahoma, it will allow the team to develop rhythm and confidence heading into its road match at Colorado on Saturday, Wegner said.

"It allows us to get in a kind of rhythm in the middle of the week, and then we play tougher teams toward the end of the week," she said.

"I think as we go through this week, if we gradually get better and better every day, I think that will help us as we prepare for Colorado down the road."

Wooldridge said.

"This is the second game in a row where we've been damaged, if you would, from the perimeter," he said, "because we didn't identify that Staples was a hot hand and was making plays out there."

The cause of the All-Stars' success from behind the arc was simple, forward Matt Siebrandt said.

"Not strong enough defense on the ball — just lack of 'D,'" he said. "We've got to come out hard every time. We can't start off easy. That's how they open a big lead."

The All-Stars did break out to a large lead, as they left the court at half-time with a 13-point advantage. In the second half, K-State held the All-Stars to just 2-for-9 shooting from behind the three-point stripe.

The change was just the result of fixing the mistakes of the first half, Siebrandt said.

"I think we played a lot more intense on defense. We locked down, where in the first half we played a little lackadaisical," he said. "In the second half, we put an emphasis on team 'D' and trying to stop them."

Wooldridge agreed his players need to change the shooter more.

"What I told our guards at halftime was more challenge than identification, so probably more of that, more intensity, more competitive spirit," Wooldridge said.

"Sometimes that's what defense is — just compete."

K-State's struggles to defend shooters could naturally heal in time. In defense of the Cats, the three players that logged the most minutes in the first half, Siebrandt and guards Larry Reid and Philias Atchison, are all community college transfers.

They could be trying to adjust to the defense required in Division-IA play. Wooldridge said he hopes so, as opposed to the alternative — that his players lack ability or give.

"I hope so," he said. "If you look at my reputation and what I've done as a coach, I have always put a premium on that end of the job."

The transfer players are running short on time, though. They need to start improving, Wooldridge said.

"This crew here is not a physical team and at times is very small. We're giving too much away," he said. "We have to analyze this a little closer, perhaps, and see if we need to make some adjustments, and if so, we'll do that."

Win over Globetrotters fails to please

The Associated Press

EAST LANSING, Mich. —

Michigan State coach Tom Izzo didn't sound like a man whose team had just ended its opponent's 1,270-game winning streak.

"I was totally, and I mean totally, disappointed in the lack of effort we showed tonight," Izzo said Monday after the third-ranked Spartans held on for a 72-68 victory over the Harlem Globetrotters. "We got beat time after time in effort-related situations that have been a staple of this program. That's a direct reflection on me as a coach. I'll take full responsibility for that, and I have to correct it."

Izzo did give credit to the Globetrotters, who have three touring teams. When they play a competitive game, rather than one for entertainment, they take the best players from the three teams.

"They caused half of our problems," Izzo said. "I was really impressed with how hard they played."

The defeat was the first for the famed traveling team since it lost to Kareem Abdul-Jabbar's All-Star team in Vienna, Austria, on Sept. 12, 1995.

"I've been the owner of the Globetrotters since 1993, and this is only the second time we've lost," said Manny Jackson, who also is the general manager of the team. "The other time was in Vienna on a weird officiating call. Getting used to losing is a different feeling for us."

This was the second of three exhibition games the Globetrotters will play against college teams. They beat NCAA Division II champion Metro State of Colorado 76-68 last Friday, and play at Purdue today.

"We wanted to play the Division I, II and III champions," Jackson said.

ROBBIE WILLIAMS

Sing When You're Winning, Capitol Records

by Steve Lichtenstein

Brash. Arrogant. Self-indulgent. Possibly the best words to sum up Robbie Williams, whose second US album (following 1999's appropriately titled The Ego Has Landed) finds the former Take That star (the UK's New Kids, er, Backstreet, er N'Sync of the early 90's) at his pop masterful best. Whether it be subtle, earnest ballads like "Better Man" and "Love Calling Earth," or groove thumpers like the infectious "Rock DJ" (with its stunning/nauseating video) or "Knutsford City Limits," Williams is definitely winning. Hence all the singing. Might as well add superb to the list and bulk up the ego a little more. CPA: 3.6 - Help Robbie's insecurity and listen to: "Let Love Be Your Energy," "The Road to Mandalay," "Rock DJ"

CREEPER LAGOON

Watering Ghost Garden, spinART Records

by Steve Lichtenstein

A little bit of everything blots indie fav Creeper Lagoon's new EP, Watering Ghost Garden, a six song hodge-podge of layered, atmospheric rock. The abstract, dissociated bravado ("Time sits on a corner/curl up inside a glass") of the Flaming Lips-tinged "Roman Hearts" gives way to the modern rock radio feel of "Big Money Struggle." All things considered, the brief album is more than enough to give fans salivating for the San Franciscan's next full-length effort something of substance to chew on until then.

Aggieville ART EXHIBITION

Local artists to display drawings, prints, ceramics at Urban Designs

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Mixed media drawings, prints and ceramics will be on display in Aggieville for the next month.

The media are part of the "Kirchhefer and Kudlacek: New Works" exhibit now featured at Urban Designs.

Artists Dan Kirchhefer and John Kudlacek will have their art displayed beginning Thursday and running through Dec. 31.

"I represented Dan's work previously," said Deborah Minner, co-owner of Urban Designs. "I thought having Kirchhefer and Kudlacek's works together made a good combination."

Minner said Kirchhefer and Kudlacek's works should draw a crowd.

RECEPTION INFO

A reception for the artists will be given from 5 to 7 p.m. Friday at Urban Designs.

"John and Dan are internationally known," she said. "Their works have attracted people from all over."

She said both artists display pieces that show complexity.

"Dan's work is of a small scale, but conveys strong emotion and intensity. His subject matter is powerful and delicate beauty," she said. "You see it as precious."

Kudlacek's work is as complex,

Minner said, but in a different form.

"John's pieces are more industrial with strong forms," she said. "It looks like metal, but is actually porcelain. It has that strong yet delicate element, which adds to the complexity angle."

Kudlacek is retired from teaching and lives in Topeka.

Kirchhefer teaches drawing, printmaking and art history at Emporia State University. His work also is being featured at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, and he was the featured gift print artist for the museum in 1997.

Suzanne Hale, Beach art museum registrar, said it is an honor to be selected as a gift print artist.

"An artist is selected from the region and asked to make a set of prints," she said. "We fund the costs, and the work is made only available to friends of the museum that year. The money made from the prints comes back to the museum."

Kirchhefer's gift print, "South of Cottonwood Falls" an etching using watercolor and pastel, is featured on the second floor and is available to outside buyers.

Female group to play annual show in Wamego

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

It's ladies' night out Saturday.

The Wamego Dutch Mill Sweet Adelines are taking the stage at the Columbian Theatre in Wamego this weekend for the group's annual show.

"It's sort of a variety show with choral music," Scott Kickhafer, artistic director, said. "They spend the majority of the year working on it. They always put on a good show."

Sweet Adelines is an international organization with 30,000 members in 22 countries.

Lynn Pepper, Sweet Adelines member, said the Wamego Dutch Mill Sweet Adelines, which was formed in 1981, has around 35 members made up of women from the surrounding area.

"It's a female-singing barber-shop harmony," Pepper said. "It's a wonderful opportunity for rural women to express their musical talent."

In past Colombian Theatre performances, the Sweet Adelines have used several themes, including the jungle and Broadway. Pepper said this year's production is titled "Hallelujah Hollywood."

"People picture Sweet Adelines as old ladies who sit there and sing," she said. "But that's not the case. The show is highly choreographed and upbeat and happy. This is a very, very funny show."

She said the group will perform several show tunes a capella in four-part harmony including, "Lean On Me," "Somewhere Over the Rainbow" and "Can You Feel The Love Tonight."

"The songs will be familiar with all audiences," Pepper said.

The Sweet Adelines also are including two opening acts as part of the performances.

The Valley Heights High School show choir is opening for the matinee, and K-State student Fran Albright, senior in open-option, is opening for the evening performance.

"Fran's an extraordinary local talent," Pepper said. "She's just such a joy."

Kickhafer said the Sweet Adelines has been successful in past performances.

"The ladies' barber shop is a unique style of singing," he said. "It's pretty popular, especially in the community and with aficionados of ladies' barber shop groups."

Theresa Doll, technical director, said this year's performances should please the audiences.

"It's just a really interesting show," Doll said. "They are a very well rehearsed group. They're going to do a good job."

Pepper said she agreed that audiences should have a good time.

"It's wholesome family entertainment," she said. "It's going to be a fun show that's full of laughs."

Investigators find details of Austrian cable-car fire

By GEIR MOULSON
The Associated Press

KAPRUN, Austria — Details about what happened in an Alpine mountain tunnel where more than 150 people died began to emerge Tuesday, with survivors and others describing explosions, sparks and knocking like that of a hammer on a pipe.

Investigators of Saturday's cable car fire in the Austrian Alps did not comment on possible causes of the tragedy, which trapped the burning car full of skiers and snowboarders inside a tunnel in Kitzsteinhorn mountain. They did say they found an oily substance that appeared to have dripped from the car.

Christian Tisch, a police forensic technician, said the material was being chemically analyzed and that it appeared to be similar in consistency to lubricants.

"The material looks as though it may have dropped from the vehicle," Tisch said. He said only that before the train entered the tunnel defects may have occurred.

Officials leading the recovery effort of victims' bodies from the tunnel on Tuesday revised the death count from the 170 they originally had thought to 156. The cable car had a turnstile counting system, but officials say children and teen-agers sometimes slip under the barrier, making that count subject to question.

Officials said they expected to retrieve all of the remains by Wednesday. They had recovered the remains of 128 people so far.

Despite new details, the cause of the deadly fire remained uncertain.

A group of survivors, members of a skiing club in the southern German town of Vilseck, said in a statement Tuesday that they heard two loud explosions, one immediately after the other, shortly after flames enveloped the car and they clambered out through a broken window and started running downhill, toward the entry point into the tunnel.

Almost immediately afterward, one of the two steel cables used to pull the car upward broke and shot by them throwing off sparks, the statement said.

"Each one in the group was in panic, fearing that the burning train could get loose and crash down the flight path," they said. Others spoke of a small explosion and then a gigantic explosion.

Eighteen people survived — six waiting at the top of the tunnel and 12 who managed to escape from the car and then ran down. Most of the victims appeared to have died outside the burning compartment, overcome by heat and smoke being pushed through the tunnel from drafts as they tried to run up.

In separate comments, Austrian Regina Rammer told state television the cable car she took — which apparently was right in front of the one that burst into flame — stopped briefly and without explanation once inside the tunnel. She then heard knocking like that of a hammer on a pipe.

The identification of all bodies could take up to four weeks, said chief forensic pathologist Edith Tutsch-Bauer. Those missing and presumed dead include eight Americans, among them a family of four and two soldiers who became engaged last week.

Israeli prime minister requests peace talks on condition that violence stops

By RON KAMPEAS
The Associated Press

CHICAGO — Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak hopes the United States and European nations will endorse his condition for a return to peace talks: a sharp reduction in Palestinian violence.

Barak took his message to President Clinton this weekend and to Jewish leaders in Chicago. He raised it again in London on Tuesday during a phone call with British Prime Minister Tony Blair and at a meeting with U.N. Secretary-General Kofi Annan.

Barak's spokesman Gadi Baltiansky said the Israeli leader repeated his demands for an end to violence and incitement before any resumption of the peace process. He told Blair that at a certain stage Israel will have to react according to its own criteria if the terrorism and assassinations continue.

Aides said Annan briefed Barak on the Islamic summit he attended this week in Qatar.

More than 200 people — the vast majority Palestinian — have been killed in the two months of violence, but the sides increasingly see the battlefield as international public and government opinion.

In a speech Monday evening to a gathering of North American Jewish leaders here, Barak said he sought a peace deal with the Palestinians through negotiations, not one that is imposed through violence or by international dictates.

"In the current round of unrest we have until now taken a path of great restraint despite constant provocations," he said, pointing to the deaths of four Israelis on Monday. "We are trying to minimize bloodshed and prevent a widening of the confrontation, but we will know how to respond."

Israeli and Palestinian leaders alike have conducted intensive diplomatic blitzes in recent weeks. Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has his own demand of the United States and Europe: He wants agreement that Israel must give up all disputed lands before he returns to negotiations.

Arafat also wants to bring the European Union, Russia, China, Jordan, Egypt and the United Nations into mediation, and wants Israel to agree to allow an international force to monitor any cease-fire.

Barak rejects what he calls internationalization of policing the conflict, saying it would infringe on Israeli sovereignty.

"Israel strives for peace that will be reached around the negotiating table, rather than through imposing of the will of one side or another through some kind of 'international assistance,'" Barak said after his meeting with Clinton.

He said he wanted a reduction in the violence, but aides say they understand Arafat is not able to stop all the violence and that Barak will settle for a drastic drop in attacks, which they say are principally initiated by the Palestinians.

Barak is maintaining a policy of restrained response to violence to secure another summit and wants to return to the Camp David understandings with the Palestinians, a senior Israeli official said on condition of anonymity.

At Camp David, Israel agreed for the first time to share Jerusalem and its holy walled Old City and to discuss the prospect of some Palestinian refugees returning to their homes. The Palestinians agreed to concede some lands captured by Israel in the 1967 Mideast war — the first time any Arab negotiators had done so.

Barak, under increasing political pressure to toughen his response to the Palestinians, has no intention of raising the stakes, said the aide. Barak was determined to maintain an opening to return to the ground-breaking Camp David talks in July.

Meanwhile, gunmen ambushed three Israeli vehicles in separate attacks on Monday, killing four Israelis. In a statement, Barak said he viewed Arafat's Palestinian Authority as being responsible for the killings.

On Tuesday, three Palestinians, including two boys aged 16 and 13, were killed and 15 wounded by Israeli fire in rock-throwing clashes in the West Bank and Gaza, doctors said.

Barak met with Clinton on Sunday night. Aides present at the meeting said Clinton wants another summit before he leaves office Jan. 20. However, a senior U.S. official told reporters following Sunday's meeting at the White House that there had been no discussion of a summit by the president and Barak.

Barak favors a summit, but first wants to see a drastic reduction in the violence.

Arafat also has indicated he would favor another summit, but he has his own conditions for going back to the table: a freeze on Jewish settlement, and a pullback of Israeli forces from the borders of Palestinian areas.

Both sides are ready to return to the breakthroughs they achieved at the Camp David summit in July as a starting point — although there would likely be differences on exactly where the summit left off.

would be able to offer services that it now cannot. The merger also would boost the local economy, Regent Janice DeBauge said.

"They believe that it will create economic growth in the area of South-Central Kansas, and that there is a demand for upper division classes," she said. "Pratt Community College wishes to have those kinds of programs that they currently don't have access to."

Pratt's inability to provide upper-level programs isn't due to any restrictions because of its classification as a community college, though. Rather, it's a function of limited funds, which could be provided by a larger state university such as Fort Hays State, DeBauge said.

The possible negatives of the merger lie in the state funding Pratt would receive — approximately $1.2 million for the first year. That number then would be adjusted to meet enrollment requirements over successive years.

The potential problem of such an arrangement is that other community colleges won't receive similar funding, DeBauge said.

"I'm concerned about how it will affect state funding — will it add cost to the state and how it will affect other institutions," she said. "It creates a different competitive environment. It gives Pratt Community College more funding than other community college."

However, the affect on institutions throughout Kansas would be hard to gauge. So far, the board has only received one letter against the merger and none for it. As a result, the board probably won't decide the issue at this time.

"We need to collect data and get statewide statistics," Hampton said.

a 300-vote lead out of 6 million votes cast — with overseas absentee ballots and ongoing recount totals pending.

Her announcement came almost three hours after a 5 p.m. vote-counting deadline, upheld earlier by state Judge Terry Lewis.

In another blow for Gore, Democratic-leaning Miami-Dade County refused his request for a recount and a second, Broward, also was inclined to reject Gore's request. A third jurisdiction, Volusia County, finished its recount Tuesday with gains for Gore. A fourth county, Palm Beach, begins its recounts Wednesday and Democrats hope to cut deeply into Bush's lead there.

Harris said she will require counties filing late recount numbers to explain in writing by 2 p.m. Wednesday why new vote totals should be accepted.

Gore decided to hold off an appeal of Lewis' ruling and press forward with recounts in four Democratic-leaning counties. Gore's advisers said they hope Harris will approve the hand-counted ballots — though they expect the worst — and are prepared to appeal if she does not.

The spotlight will remain on Harris as she decides whether to accept the county recounts. Another pivot point is Friday, when overseas ballots are due and counting begins. The race tumbled to the courts after a statewide machine recount trimmed Bush's lead from 1,784 votes to a few hundred, prompting Gore to push for painstaking manual recounts and Bush to fight them in courts of law and public opinion.

The presidents-in-waiting are trying to strike a balance between their desire to be seen as prepared — and a fear that they will appear overeager.

Gore leads in the nationwide popular vote by just 200,000 votes out of 100 million cast, but the Electoral College tally is so close that whoever takes Florida almost certainly will win the White House. Only three times in the nation's history has a candidate won the popular vote but lost the presidential race, the last time in 1888.

Bush maintains slim lead; count continues

By ANNE GEARAN
The Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — A federal appeals court agreed Wednesday to hear George W. Bush's constitutional challenge to hand recounts in Florida's disputed presidential election, while a state court let the counting proceed for now.

The federal court's unusually rapid decision to get involved could launch the presidential stalemate toward the U.S. Supreme Court.

At the close of a day of legal wrangling, Vice President Al Gore floated two possible solutions. He suggested a hand recount of all 6 million ballots cast in Florida's 67 counties if Republicans won't accept results of recounts in three counties selected by Democrats.

Bush has a 300-vote lead in the state that stands to decide who will be America's next president. The final tally hinges on an unknown number of overseas absentee ballots as well as the disputed recounts.

The decision by the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Atlanta to intervene came as the main players in the vote count also asked Florida's highest court to settle some of the questions.

Secretary of State Katherine Harris led the parade to the Florida Supreme Court with an early-morning lawsuit asking the justices to block the hand recounts at least temporarily, and to consolidate election-related lawsuits. The court turned her down without a hearing.

The Bush campaign has fought to stop the recounts on several fronts.

Former Secretary of State James A. Baker III argued Wednesday that the process is unfair, gives rise to human error and gives rise to the potential for great mischief.

Warren Christopher, the former secretary of state chosen to lead Gore's recount, defended the legal strategy.

"We simply must, in order to protect the rights of the vice president in this matter, enable us to take steps that seem warranted," Christopher said.

In rejecting Harris' suit, the justices, all chosen by Democratic governors, did not address the many other election-related legal challenges making their way through Florida courts.

"Our legal team is reviewing it, but we are certainly pleased the court has ordered that the counts should proceed," said Doug Hattaway, a spokesman for Democrat Al Gore.

The Bush camp disputed that interpretation and noted that the state high court's one-paragraph rejection slip did not address the substance of Harris' request. The court left open the option that Harris could sue in a lower state court, or make her arguments another way.

The state high court agreed to review complaints from two South Florida counties — Broward and Palm Beach — that say they are confused about how to proceed with recounts. Harris and state Democratic Attorney General Bob Butterworth have given the counties conflicting guidance. The counties are suing both.

Democrats requested hand recounts in Volusia, Broward, Palm Beach, and Miami-Dade counties. Volusia has already completed its recount while Miami-Dade, Florida's largest, has declined a countywide hand recount for the time being. All are heavily Democratic areas where Gore supporters hope to find additional votes for the vice president.

Dixie Chicks concert tonight

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

Tickets are still available to fill the "Wide Open Spaces" at Bramlage Coliseum tonight for the Dixie Chicks concert.

Charlie Thomas, associate director of Bramlage, said tickets will be sold until showtime at 7:30.

"We still have good seats," he said.

Bramlage is unable to disclose the exact number of ticket sales because the promoter, MusicCountry.com, owns the rights to such information, Thomas said.

However, ticket sales haven't been as high as expected. Thomas said the show date falling on a weeknight and the ticket price of $45.50 plus handling fees could be to blame.

"I hope it's a little bit lengthy," Zac Stuckey, sophomore in public relations, said. "They were a little bit pricey as far as tickets go."

Thomas said the ticket prices are determined by the promoter and the group, and the amount usually is enough to at least break even or make some profit.

"We're kind of in an area where you don't have a lot of big shows come through," he said. "People don't realize they're extremely expensive."

Despite the costs, Stuckey said he is excited to see the group, winner of four Country Music Association awards, in person.

"They've got a pretty good style," Stuckey said. "Their appearance and how they get a little crazy — It's kind of a change in country music."

From catering to set configurations, the Bramlage staff has been busy preparing for the group's arrival.

"It's a sizable show," Thomas said. "It's kept our staff busy for a long time."

For Allen Roepka, sophomore in finance and business administration, the Dixie Chicks will be the first concert he has attended at Bramlage.

"It's just a break in the monotony of the school year," he said. "Something different."

Big 12 Championship ticket sales to resume if Cats win Saturday

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Tickets for the general public are sold out for the Dec. 2 Big 12 Championship game at Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo., according to K-State Sports Information.

However, in the event that either K-State defeats Missouri this Saturday in Columbia or Nebraska loses to Colorado on Nov. 24 in Lincoln, the Wildcats would represent the Big 12 North Division in the game.

If such is the case, K-State would be allocated about 8,000 tickets to the contest, as would Big 12 South Division champion Oklahoma.

Yet, only 1,000 of those tickets will be available to students, and those eligible to buy them are limited to students who had purchased a 2000 student football season ticket, said Carol Adolph, director of the Bramlage Coliseum Ticket Office.

She said the other remaining 7,000 tickets will be issued to football players' parents, the K-State Marching Band and donors of the Mike Ahearn Scholarship fund.

Nevertheless, when these tickets would become available is pending, Adolph said, and that information will be made public once the North Division representative is finalized.

In turn, if the Cats defeat the Tigers this weekend, information regarding when tickets will become available will be made public immediately following the game. Adolph said information will be distributed via radio, television and all other media outlets. In addition, an announcement will be made at Saturday's men's basketball game versus Texas-San Antonio at Bramlage Coliseum.

If K-State loses Saturday, however, information will not be released until after the outcome of the Nov. 24 Nebraska/Colorado game.

Look for updated information regarding ticket sales in Monday's Collegian.

Houses participate in homeless camp-out to raise funds

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

Camping out in boxes and pretending to be homeless is a tactic Alpha Tau Omega members are using to find new appreciation for the facilities they use on a daily basis.

Members of ATO are being host to the annual "Homeless for Hunger" philanthropy, which lasts five days and five nights. Participants are required to camp out at various sites during the event.

Lance Jones, junior in marketing, rubs his face while relaxing outside of the Alpha Chi Omega sorority for Homeless for Hunger. The event lasts five days and five nights.

"We have created a homeless aspect to the degree that we can, yet it is still adaptable to regular college students' lives," Lance Jones, junior in marketing, said.

This year was the first year that women were given the opportunity to get involved. Participants of the event included 25 members of ATO, and five members of different sororities.

"When I found out that girls could take part, I was excited because it's a fun experience, and a great opportunity to meet new people," Krissy Eenhuis, senior in public relations, said. "It is also an opportunity to raise money for a good cause."

The students attend classes and scheduled activities, but they can't return to their residence, unless of an emergency. All meals are provided for each crew during the week.

"We actually have the option of going inside a house to get food, use the restroom or any other necessity, but homeless people don't have this luxury," Ben Porter, junior in marketing, said.

Participants are separated into five groups of six students and each group camps at a designated sorority each night. Sponsors of the philanthropy that provided campsites include Alpha Chi Omega, Sigma Kappa, Alpha Delta Pi, Chi Omega, Alpha Xi Delta and Pi Beta Phi.

"This year we had a good representation and response rate from the event, but we hope to keep increasing and make it a philanthropy that everyone will want to experience," Jones said.

Each crew was furnished with a makeshift cardboard house held together with duct tape. The homes were made Sunday as the kickoff to the event. Groups must rotate houses daily and report to the runners by 10 a.m.

"The boxed served as a real warmth from the extremely cold weather," Porter said, "although I still found that my feet were numb and there was frost on my face when I woke up."

Every morning when the groups arrive at the new site, they were given clues. The clues might have referred to someone on campus to contact, or a topic, such as the homeless, to research. At the end of the week, the group who figures out the most clues will win.

"Throughout the week the participants learn more about being homeless and begin to appreciate their residence a lot more," Jones said.

All proceeds will benefit the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and the Flint Hills Breadbasket. There will be an award given to the organization who donates the most to Homeless for Hunger.

"It has been an eye-opening, new and positive experience for me," Tanner Klingzell, sophomore in finance, said. "It's not the easiest fight, but definitely the best cause, and I've enjoyed sticking together through the cold weather with my group."

Collegian ad manager, editor in chief named

K-State's Board of Student Publications filled the positions of editor in chief and advertising manager for the Collegian for the spring 2001 semester Wednesday.

Sarah Bahari, junior in print journalism, was selected as the spring editor in chief. She now is serving as city and government editor for the Collegian and said she looks forward to serving K-State students.

"I want to continue the precedent that has been set, but I'll bring a fresh perspective," she said.

When she started working as a staff writer, Bahari said she knew she wanted to pursue this position at some point.

"When I first started working on the Collegian, I knew I wanted to do this," she said. "Now I have the experience and knowledge to do the job."

Danny Ellsworth, senior in advertising, was hired as the Collegian advertising manager. He has been working this semester as an account executive selling in part of the Aggieville territory.

Ellsworth said being hired for the position is an honor and a chance to be challenged. He said it means even more working for a newspaper recognized so highly in collegiate journalism.

"To me, it's very gratifying to be a manager of the paper, especially after all of the awards the paper recently won," he said. "It gives you a sense of pride to work for one of the best college publications in the country."

Former priest pleads innocent to sex charges

NEWTON, Kan. — A former priest pleaded innocent Wednesday to charges stemming from the alleged sexual abuse of altar boys more than a decade ago.

Earlier this week, Robert K. Larson was charged in Harvey County District Court with four counts of indecent liberties with a child and one count of sexual battery.

The charges stemmed from allegations made by men who say they were abused by Larson while he was the priest at St. Mary's Catholic Church in Newton during the 1980s.

Larson, now 70 and living in Ohio, served in several parishes in the Diocese of Wichita for 30 years. After several allegations of abuse, he was stripped of his title and duties in 1988 and sent to Maryland for treatment.

His lawyer, Dan Monnat of Wichita, said Larson will fight the charges.

Legislation on seat belts to be debated once more

TOPEKA — It looks like lawmakers next year will have another chance to debate whether Kansas should have a tougher seat belt law. But some say chances of changing the law are doubtful.

The Special Committee on Judiciary agreed Wednesday to recommend drafting legislation for next year making failure to wear a seat belt a primary offense, meaning a driver could be stopped simply for not being buckled up.

State law now says a driver can be cited for not wearing a seat belt only when stopped for another offense, such as speeding.

House Judiciary Chairman Mike O'Neal, who leads the special committee, cast doubts on whether the legislation has much chance of passage. Lawmakers defeated two similar proposals earlier this year.

Senate Judiciary Chairman Tim Emert, R-Independence, a member of the special committee, agreed that passing such legislation will be difficult.

Supporters of a stronger law say it would save more lives. Opponents say it's another example of government intrusion.

"There are more than 100 reasons for law enforcement to stop a car. They can stop a car for not having a tail light, which hasn't cost one life, but we can't stop them for not having a seat belt," Rep. David Huff, R-Lenexa, said.

The committee considered the issue at the request of Gov. Bill Graves, who included the seat belt proposal in his legislative package for the 2000 session.

Graves spokesman Don Brown said Wednesday the governor remains optimistic that the law can be made tougher after the Legislature convenes Jan. 8.

He said Graves is strongly considering including the legislation

Renovations near end at Frank Myers Field

■ Baseball team, coach prepare for 2001 season with completed stadium.

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's baseball program, after an extended wait, is getting its field of dreams.

Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage Coliseum, said the majority of the renovations to Frank Myers Field should be completed for the upcoming 2001 season.

However, an exact date remains undetermined, as Thomas said the construction delays stem from the gift-in-kind type of financing.

"It is hard to say when you are dealing with gift-in-kind. You basically kind of are at their beck and call," he said.

Gift-in-kind is a process that deals with donated time and materials, and with it come a number of variables. Thomas said a situation can occur when the materials are there to be used, but a construction crew is not able to work.

The reverse also can happen, and Thomas said coordination becomes a factor, which makes estimating the project's completion date difficult to pinpoint.

Items still to be completed on Frank Myers Field are the lower level concession stands, stone work to the exterior and other interior work, which includes heating and air conditioning.

Also on the construction list are the stadium's press and suite level, an elevator tower, public toilets, fire alarms, plumbing and offices.

K-State head baseball coach Mike Clark said as the construction process continues the excitement from the community is growing.

"When they started putting the trusses on the roof of the press level, I must have gotten 10 calls from people around town who were excited," Clark said.

The value of the project, K-State athletics director Max Urlick said, is at $3.2 million.

Gift-in-kind revenue has funded the majority of the project, Thomas said, as well as the efforts of Ernie Barrett, director of development for the Intercollegiate Athletic Agency.

"Ernie Barrett is a wizard at getting this type of stuff done," he said. "It is unbelievable."

However, Barrett, attributes fund raising to the relationships he's made with people over the years.

"I think it is time as much as anything else," Barrett said. "I was involved with getting the stadium built in 1968, and then with other projects along the way."

The university's latest project has been a lengthy one for the K-State baseball program. In 1999, the Cats played the season on the road and last season played home games in an unfinished stadium.

Clark said it's been a difficult process, but he's appreciative of the way his players have handled the situation.

"It has been a challenge from a player and a coach's standpoint, but I think it has been handled the right way the last couple of years,"

"When they started putting the trusses on the roof of the press level, I must have gotten 10 calls from people around town who were excited"

he said. "We have never used it as an excuse and have always worked to do the best we could. You have no idea how proud we are to have this facility."

Clark, who's been at the helm of the K-State baseball program for the past 15 years, said the stadium will give the program a fresh start.

It is a complex, Clark said, he believes will stand the test of time, as well as one the program will appreciate more.

"We could have built this stadium in a year," he said, "but it would not have been as nice a facility."

Barrett said generating fan support for the program has been difficult at times, but attendance should be enhanced with the new stadium.

"Thing is, the team starts its season in the cold months, and it is too cold to go sit on bleachers," he said. "Hopefully, a new stadium will change all that, and we will have the opportunity to draw more fans."

Volunteers still being sought for Indoor Special Olympics

■ Games beginning Friday include volleyball, bowling competitions across city.

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Special Olympic Indoor Games will make their first appearance in Manhattan this weekend, and volunteers are still needed for the event.

More than 1,300 athletes will participate in volleyball and bowling tournaments Friday and Saturday, said Susan Krumm, assistant vice president of sports and competition with Special Olympics.

Special Olympics is a year-round training and competition for people with disabilities.

Anyone can volunteer at the event and those interested should show up from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. Friday or 1 to 5 p.m. Saturday at Memory Lanes for the bowling tournament. The volleyball tournament takes place at Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex.

Volunteers can benefit from the experience, Krumm said.

"They can benefit from socially interacting with athletes," she said. "With events like this, we've found that volunteers form collaborations within their community."

Becky Blake, director of convention and visitor's bureau, said the Special Olympics will bring much to Manhattan.

"It's very beneficial," she said.

"Besides the athletes, there will also be spectators and others that travel with them and spend money in our community."

This tournament usually is divided into two locations — eastern Kansas and western Kansas divisions, Krumm said.

They decided to combine the two for the first time and move them from Lawrence and Salina to Manhattan.

"Manhattan is a good town. It's centrally located, and they have a lot to offer," she said.

Blake said she is excited to be host to the Olympics and encourages spectators to come watch.

"We're thrilled to have it here," she said. "It's a great event."

Sex education vital for active students' safety

Sex is something that should be discussed openly in our society.

Members of the Moore Hall Governing Board realize this and decided to start a new tradition for residence halls with their Sex and Sexuality Week.

The week includes guest speakers as well as different ways to learn about sex and related topics, such as date rape and STDs.

It is important for college students to be informed about such issues in ways aside from the usual lecture setting. This is a great experience for students in Moore Hall.

Students need to know that there is no excuse not to practice safe sex. There are inexpensive condoms for sale at Lafene, as well as more affordable birth control pills.

Of course, it's always important to remember that the only safest sex is no sex at all. Abstinence is a choice that some students opt to take for moral, religious or personal beliefs.

If you are going to have sex, you need to protect yourself first and foremost. Protect yourself from diseases and from unwanted pregnancies. By using inexpensive methods of birth control, you are showing your partner that you care about your body, and ultimately about yourself.

The Collegian's Campus Forum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

What is the deal with all of the orange baracades behind Weber? Put in a sidewalk, for goodness sakes.

Who won between Bush and Gore? Oh yeah, who cares?

This might be a stupid idea, but why don't they turn that big, huge grassy area on the east side of Anderson into a parking lot?

I was wondering why we didn't have to use our IDs to get into tonight's basketball game? What's up with that?

What is the only thing slower than election 2000? Napster.

Unless you students want to be a big red grease stain on someone's oil pan, stop and look before you cross on crosswalks on Manhattan Avenue.

First you take my Coke, then my Napster. What next?

I think at least half of the one percent Ken was talking about was the crossword puzzle. Now that you got that fixed, make way for a perfect Collegian.

Thanksgiving? Forget it. Christmas? You can keep it. Just make this semester end. Now.

Enrolling on KATS makes you want to break stuff.

How is it possible for K-State to condone millions of trees for recruiting, but they can't kill one tree to actually send out mid-term grades?

The sensible and economical way to reduce the campus parking problem isn't a parking garage, but for apartment complex residents to carpool. But I know they won't.

Abortion = MURDER

Mother's right to choose ends at conception; babies have rights also

As our country tries to sort out the voting mess in Florida and the legal problems that are sure to follow, there is more at stake with this election than most people realize. A baby's right to live hangs in the balance, which has been overshadowed by economic issues and foreign policy stances.

JEFF ELLIOTT

the right to do what she wishes with her body.

George W. Bush, the man who most likely will be the victor of the election (pending that the members of the Gore campaign eventually will admit that they lost and get on with their lives), stands for the rights of every American, both born and unborn.

Bush might not be as experienced of a president as Gore would have been, but, thankfully, he understands and values an important truth: a woman's right to choose what she does with her body ends at conception.

I'm sure many people will marvel at the nerve one must have to make such a remark. A pro-choice response to a statement like this is indicative of the state of moral and emotional depravity in which we live. People are more concerned about their right to choose than the consequences of their choice.

Pro-choice activists stand on a platform of selfishness and thrive on answering to no one for their actions. Armed with an "it's my body and no bill will tell me what to do with it" attitude, pro-choice proponents support the estimated 1 million babies who will be killed this year alone.

One million. The problem is that our country has become so calloused that we see an unborn baby as a pre-life substance that is remorselessly expendable. Pro-choice supporters can have a clear conscience about their stance because they kid themselves into believing that a pregnant woman is carrying a fetus, not a life, and therefore aborting is acceptable.

When was the last time you saw a woman hold her stomach and get excited because "her fetus just kicked"? Have you ever heard someone say, "do you know what sex the fetus is yet"? No, of course you haven't.

Wed or unwed, wanted or unwanted, there is a baby growing inside of a mother and it is alive. This is an indisputable truth.

In Delaware, Amy Grossberg and Brian Peterson, two high school students, were charged with first-degree murder after disposing of their newborn's body in a dumpster outside of a hotel in 1996. They both were sentenced to eight years in prison.

Melissa Drexler, in a highly publicized incident, gave birth to a baby boy in a bathroom at prom, removed him from the toilet, then wrapped him in garbage bags and put him in a trash can. The charges were reduced from first degree murder to aggravated manslaughter because she admitted to the murder.

Susan Smith of South Carolina is serving a life sentence for killing her children by driving them into a lake.

People were outraged at the murders of these four children, but what's the difference between what these women did and what is done to the 2,700 babies that fall victim to abortion every day?

Does murder become legally and socially acceptable just because a woman has an appointment?

No one seems to care about the aborted babies that suffer the pain and agony of being ripped apart by an abortion doctor. Do you think a baby born six weeks premature is more sensitive to pain than a baby that is aborted in the third trimester in some states? There's nothing magical about birth. An unborn child suffers the same as a child killed after being born and tossed into a dumpster.

We stare in horror when a mother kills her child, yet we turn our face away from the brutal truth that lies with abortion. We say that babies are precious and stand up for the rights of children, but in the name of convenience, we justify taking the life of an unborn child so we won't have to bear the burden of being responsible for what we do with our bodies.

Instances of rape and incest carry with them case-by-case circumstances and are the exception rather than the norm.

Even in these situations, an unborn baby is a life, no matter how it is conceived, and it has the right to live.

I am all about a woman having the right to choose. The choice begins with deciding whether to have sex.

Bottom line: If a woman chooses to have sex and gets pregnant, her right to choose ends at conception. It's time for the selfish people of our nation to step up and to stop taking the easy way out by taking a life because they refuse to be accountable for their own.

Jeff Elliott is a fifth-year senior in accounting. You can e-mail him at jae0484@ksu.edu.

ADAM HAYES/Collegian

Women deserve choices when deciding on abortion

Every year, thousands of people begin the adoption procedure, hoping to adopt a beautiful, healthy newborn. Each has his or her own reason, but all of them want to provide a home for an infant who does not have one.

But what about the children who, for whatever reason, the system fails? The ones who are too old for traditional adoptions, or too sick, or in some way not the ideal of the beautiful, healthy baby—what about them? There are thousands of people wanting to adopt every year, many of whom end up whom no one seems to want.

Thankfully, there are families willing to move past the ideal image and offer loving homes to children of different races, children with birth defects and the old children no one wanted before. But there aren't enough of them.

The claim some people make that every child born will be wanted and cared for is incorrect. There are unwanted children, a fact that sickens me. And if every pregnancy, regardless of the circumstances behind conception, is forced to term, there will be more.

In 1973, Roe v. Wade gave American women the right to decide what will happen to our bodies. We were given the right to choose. It's a choice that shouldn't be made without careful thought and counseling, but it is a choice.

Saying women give up that choice the moment they conceive is like arguing that a man gives up the right to run off like a scared wuss the minute he impregnates someone. Yet you never hear of anyone picketing a deadbeat dad or an ex-boyfriend who couldn't handle the news of impending fatherhood.

If it takes two people to conceive a baby, why is it solely the woman's responsibility after it happens? Who came up with that double standard? If the male half of the relationship can't handle the knowledge that the birth control failed, how is the female half supposed to be mature enough to do it?

Of course, I can't forget the instances where the pregnancy is the result of nonconsensual intercourse, such as rape or incest. Some women can handle the burden of a living, breathing reminder of their trauma. Some can't. It's cruel to demand that of them.

I'm saddened to say that sometimes a pregnancy can lead to severe health problems in the mother. I cry every time I hear of a woman who must choose between the life of her child or her own. It's a heartbreaking decision.

The fact remains, regardless of the ultimate decision, it is a choice. It's a choice that I, like every other woman in the United States, have. I can tell you right now, without a single doubt, what my choice would be, and even though I cannot see myself ever choosing an abortion, I sleep better knowing the choice is mine.

It's my body; it's my choice.

Fans need to recognize K-State football strides

Editor,

I love being a student at K-State. However, I am disappointed with a part of the student body. When our football team loses, there is a portion of season ticket-holding students here who become very negative. You know the ones. They call in to the Campus Forum voicing their dissatisfaction with the team. They are the ones you hear in class expressing their frustration with the team's ticket is worth once the team loses.

Ironically, these are the same people who are extremely happy when the team wins (maybe the value of their ticket went up, I don't know.) Loyal fans call these people "fair weather" fans. These loyal fans then call into the Forum and express their frustration with the "fair weather" fans and so on.

I would like to take a different approach. Being a loyal fan, I do not wish to criticize the negative feelings that these "fair weather" fans demonstrate year in and year out when we lose a game.

However, I am of the opinion that fans of the "fair weather" sort need a reminder of where we have been, where we are now and where we will be in the future.

We first appeared on the national championship scene during the last two years or so. But think about how short the time span has been. We went from being the worst division I football team in college football history 10 or 11 years ago to a national championship contender in under a decade!

While Nebraska has won five national championships, an outstanding accomplishment, you can trace their football prominence back to the 1920s or even earlier.

My point being, it's extremely hard to compete for a national championship every year, let alone win one. We here at K-State need to understand we are a part of something very special, something most college students never get to experience. Be proud of the fact that the school you attend is able to compete year in and year out for the highest honor in college football. We're getting so close and we've gotten here in such a short time.

Our first national championship is not far away; each year we are just one big game from achieving the right to play in the national championship.

Once we win one, top high school football recruits across the country (who normally would have chosen Nebraska, Florida or Florida State) will begin to appreciate what Bill Snyder has done, find out what K-State football is all about and then sign on to help us win another one. Then the construction of a truly dominant football dynasty begins.

In closing, it is my wish that the "fair weather" fans first remember where we came from when they begin to criticize the team during a temporary setback, such as a loss. Then, take into perspective where we are on the national championship timeline. After doing so, I would like to invite these fans to come aboard and be a part of history in the making ... it's going to be a fun ride.

Sex week aims to educate freshmen

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Members of Moore Hall Governing Board started a new tradition by organizing the first annual Sex and Sexuality Week for the residence hall.

"It is really a lot of events that are geared towards education about sex-related topics," said Mari Johann, Moore Hall information coordinator and historian. "We started thinking in August about some of the biggest issues college students, especially freshmen, have to deal with when they enter college. We decided something that dealt with all aspects of sex would be beneficial."

"We want to take it a step beyond the high school sex ed class."

The week was designed to feature guest speakers every night of the week.

Johann, junior in fine arts, said Moore HGB looked for speakers that could bring a different view point to students.

"They all have a special area that they will be speaking about," she said. "But all of the topics really will affect the students in one way or another while they are at school. They really have a lot to benefit from attending."

The week began Monday with guest speakers from Lafene Health Center's Women's Clinic.

"We had a great turnout for the speaker on Monday," Jon Krasnoff, president of Moore Hall, said. "All residents were encouraged to attend, and I think most of them who did, went away with some beneficial information."

Krasnoff, sophomore in open-option, said it was difficult to convince the men of the hall to come because they felt it was more geared toward women's issues.

"It was hard at first," he said.

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Paul Myers, junior in radio/TV, and Marjorie O'Bryan, sophomore in technical theater, participate in the STD, HIV, AIDS and Peer Educators demonstration at Moore Hall on Tuesday night. They had a race to see who could put a condom on a banana the fastest.

"Once we got them there they realized that these issues do affect them, too. The interest is really starting to pick up."

Monday night's speaker brought in between 40-50 students. Krasnoff said.

Among those attending was Danielle Couch, a Moore Hall resident.

"At first, I have to admit, my roommate and I went for the ice cream," Couch, freshman in business management, said. "But it really became a lot more meaningful for us. It was emotional because of the reality about date rape. It hit us hard that it could happen to anyone on campus. It could happen to you because of your naivness about the topic."

Couch said she plans on listening to more of the guest speakers throughout the week because of the education it provides.

"It is good to be aware," she said. "I think it is the first step in prevention."

Other speakers for the week included STD, HIV, AIDS and Peer Educators on Tuesday and Dr. Wendy Blank from Lafene Health Center on Wednesday. Representatives from the Queer Straight Alliance will speak tonight, and members of Men Against Rape Society will speak Friday.

The week will conclude with several events Saturday.

"They are all going to be fun ways to learn about sex and related topics," Krasnoff said. "The programs will not just focus on sex as in the traditional men and women sex, but will relate to topics centered around sexuality, too."

The events Saturday will include "Who has an STD?", a card game that will help explain how easy it is to transmit and receive an STD; "Where do you Stand?", a game that helps students express their opinion on topics relating to sexuality; Condom Olympics, an event to help show the flexibility and durability of a condom; and Battle of the Sexes Jeopardy, to review everything the residents learned during the week.

"This is really a trial period," Johann said. "We are hoping this week goes over well and then next year we hope to expand it to an all-hall event to encompass all residents. We really believe it will make a difference."

Flint Hills Breadbasket prepares for holiday meal

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

Warm turkey, cranberries and stuffing won't be served just at grandma's house this Thanksgiving. The Flint Hills Breadbasket will serve a dinner to any and all who want to celebrate the holiday with the community.

The Flint Hills Breadbasket will have its annual communitywide Thanksgiving dinner Nov. 23. The dinner will begin at noon and run until 2 p.m. at the Manhattan High School East Campus. All are more than welcome to attend, said Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket. Bramhall said people wanting to participate can call for reservations, but also are welcome to just show up.

"We see all kinds of people participate in the dinner from the mayor and city congressmen to students who can't go home or families who don't have people coming home," Bramhall said.

Bramhall said it takes about 200 volunteers to put on the dinner, and estimated 800 to 900 people are served throughout the day. Every year the Breadbasket not only serves the people who come, but takes dinner to the disabled and to civil servants who have to work.

"It is lots of fun," she said. "We do deliveries to the fire station, the prison and all of those people who can't take off work."

David Echols, warehouse assistant for the Breadbasket, said this will be his third year to volunteer. He said no one should feel estranged about coming to the dinner.

"I would say it is one place where no one notices who comes in the door," Echols said. "The place is full of warmth and good-smelling food."

Bramhall has helped out with the dinner for 10 years. She said it has changed her perception of the holidays.

"This has made me grateful, and it is fun to see the community come together," Bramhall said. "It is so neat to see the hard work that goes into the dinner and the young and old coming together."

the dinner and the young and old coming together. It is like a bit of peace on earth."

Echols said the experience takes the selfishness out of the holiday and is like a communitywide family reunion.

"It has been a fun experience," Echols said. "We have met the needy and the not-so-needy. It is a chance to see how much need is in the community and makes you feel good."

For four years, Jim Williams, Manhattan resident, and his wife have worked as the greeters for the dinner. Williams said they welcome the people as they come in and try to find them a place to sit.

Williams said they have been volunteering because they enjoy the experience of working with the community. This tradition has become so ingrained that he said his family often comes with them to the dinner. For Williams, this experience is not one they plan to give up anytime soon.

"As long as we are able to do it we will," he said. "It has become a tradition for the Williams family."

"It is so neat to see the hard work that goes into the dinner and the young and old coming together."

GAME NOTES

Lucky 19

K-State's victory over Oklahoma marks the sixth consecutive season the Cats have recorded at least 19 wins.

Branting nears record

With 10 kills versus the Sooners, senior Kelle Branting needs just 13 more kills to pass Kate DeClerk (1993-95) and become the all-time kills leader by a middle blocker.

Wegner moving up

Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner's 15 kills against OU moves her past Shawnee Call for fourth place on the all-time career kills chart.

Three and out

Of K-State's 19 wins this season, 15 of them have come in three games.

Steady setter

Junior Disney Bronnenberg has started every game and every match of her Wildcat career. Wednesday's contest with Oklahoma marked her 85th consecutive start in 305 games.

Reversal of fortune

With the victory, K-State has now won seven of the past 10 meetings over the Sooners after losing 37 of the previous 44 matches from 1975 to '95.

By the numbers

Following the OU win, K-State improved to 12-1 when holding its opponents under .200 hitting percentage, 17-0 when having a higher hitting percentage than its opponents, and 10-0 when hitting .300 or better.

Oklahoma's Cathy Cook has a K-State spike slide through her arms during a block attempt in their game against the Wildcats on Wednesday evening at Ahearn Field House. The Wildcats won the match 15-1, 15-2 and 15-5.

Wildcats shock Sooners with quick 3-0 victory

By SAM STIERS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team overwhelmed Oklahoma en route to an impressive 3-0 victory Wednesday night.

Originally, it was the Sooners who dominated the series, as they lead K-State 40-13 all-time. However, recently the tables have turned as the Cats have won seven of the past 10 meetings.

The Cats (19-6, 13-4) only trailed once the entire match, as Oklahoma (7-18, 2-15) never threatened to take a game. K-State won the match 15-1, 15-2 and 15-5.

Despite the ease with which the Cats dispensed of the Sooners, head coach Jim McLaughlin said the victory was not as easy as it might have seemed.

"These matches are a little harder than they look," he said. "You really have to get your emotions up to play and keep your energy up. I thought our team did a real good job of that. Oklahoma has some players, they just didn't pass well tonight."

One reason for OU's poor passing was the Cats' aggressive serving, McLaughlin said. K-State had five service aces and only four errors.

"That's maybe the most important part of the game," he said, "the ability to serve and take a team out of what they want to do. We've really had to put an emphasis on that, but we're getting better and better at serving."

K-State's offense also played well. The Cats finished with a .451 hitting percentage, and McLaughlin said he has seen continual improvement over the past several games.

"It's been getting better and better the last

Men's team ready for regular season

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

After losing its two exhibition games, K-State men's basketball is set to open the regular season Saturday against Texas-San Antonio.

However, even though the losses didn't count toward the Cats' record, they did much in assessing the team's status, head coach Jim Wooldridge said, and he's worried.

The two games pointed out struggles both offensively and defensively, he said, in areas such as shot identification, developing an inside game, finishing cuts and the team's inability to get to the shooter, especially from three-point range.

Forward Matt Siebrandt, a native of Reno, Nev., said some of those problems can be attributed to the transition he and other transfers, such as Larry Reid, Phineas Atchison and Richie Terry, have been forced to make from junior college.

"It just takes a matter of time to get adjusted," Siebrandt said after the Cats' 78-73 loss to Global Sports, Nov. 6. "Everybody talks about the biggest thing from juco to Division I-A is the adjustment, and that's what's good about these exhibition games, it gives me and the other guys a chance to get settled in and get used to it."

Siebrandt's struggles have especially shown up on the offensive end of the floor, as the sophomore has shot a combined 9-for-28 from the field during the two preseason games.

"I don't know if I'm rushing it or what, but I think I know what I'm doing wrong so hopefully I can improve on it Saturday and at least start making some more shots," he said Tuesday.

"You can't make every shot. Some of them were rimming out and stuff, but I was missing a lot of them pretty bad. I just think it's a matter of concentration and hopefully I'll fix that by Saturday."

Regardless of the difficulties, Wooldridge said he's a firm believer in the Cats' triangle offense and its potential this season.

"I think it's a great format, I really do. It's a format that players can improve in, it's a format that can be changed, but yet the system doesn't change," he said.

"You can tweak this offense to fit your personnel. It's an offense,

I think first and foremost, that you can see improvement in the individual skills it takes to perform in it, and the fundamentals that you teach every day to perform in it."

Center Kelvin Howell said Wooldridge is an ideal coach to teach such an offensive style.

"He gets right involved in practice, and I think that's a good thing for our team," Howell said of the Cat coach. "He's a very detailed guy. He can tell you what he wants you to do, and if you're not doing it right, he's going to get in there and show you."

That detail and motivation was evident in Wooldridge at the Oct. 25 Big 12 Men's Basketball Media Day in Kansas City, Mo., as well, where the Cat coach talked about the privileges he's received in taking over the head coaching job at K-State.

"I think that every coach would tell you on our staff that we're getting to do something that you can look at two ways. We are building this program from ground zero — that's the way we look at it — and we're getting to put our stamp on nearly every part of this program, which is fun, I enjoy that. And then you can look at it where people pick you — you're picked last and you're starting

Guards lead team early in women's basketball

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

When the K-State women's basketball team began practicing about a month ago, no one was sure exactly what to expect out of the team.

Six of the 13 members were new to the program, and the Cats had no returning post players with any significant collegiate experience. In turn, they looked to depend on the only upperclassmen on the team — the guards.

So far, everything has gone pretty much as planned, as the guards have definitely led the team. In the Cats' last game against Club Volna, guards Kim Woodlee and April Sailors combined to hit 15 three-pointers and accounted for more than half of the team's 88 points.

Now, K-State must try to repeat that performance in its first regular season game against UMKC on Friday.

"I would love it if we were as effective in three-pointers as we have been," head coach Deb Patterson said. "I'm hopeful it can be a viable weapon for the rest of the season."

Just as the guards have lived up to their billing, so have K-State's post players. The youth have struggled, but also shown flashes of potential. Forward Nicole Ohlde, for instance, has averaged 10 points per game, and forward Andrea Armstrong scored 14 points, including 10 from the free-throw line, against Club Volna.

"When we evaluate the post game in terms of the freshmen, we look at touches and if they're getting to the line," Patterson said. "At this point, Andrea Armstrong has shown the ability to be effective, but the door remains open as to who else will emerge."

While K-State's inside game is young, it has actually been better than last year's senior-led squad in some areas, Patterson said.

"We're not as good at scoring as last year, but we have shown that we can rebound better than last year," she said. "It's time to step up in a game that counts and make jump shots."

However, if other post players are to step up, it will have to be against UMKC's 6-foot, 4-inch Wieslawa Zakrzewska, who blocked 50 shots last season. If the inside players do play well, the Cats will be able to push the ball against UMKC, which has only eight players on the roster.

"I certainly hope we can put some pressure on UMKC in that respect," Patterson said. "If we do a good job on the boards, we certainly could work to push the ball every opportunity we've got. Whether or not we can run in transition depends on the posts, though."

K-State fans need to support basketball program, show school spirit

All right, kids, it's time to buck up and be little troopers like I know you all are.

For the first half of K-State's second exhibition game against the California All-Stars, both the fans and the team stunk.

Since this is about the 50th column I've written about how crappy we as K-State basketball fans are, you'd think people would get the point by now, but I guess not.

Sure, K-State trailed by 13 to a team that had only seven players. Sure, K-State shot 37 percent in the first half. Sure, K-State ... enough already.

The Wildcats weren't playing great, so what did we as fans choose to do? We certainly didn't encourage them. Nope. Instead, I heard 40 or 50 morons picking on Rumeal Robinson every time he touched the ball simply because he plays basketball for a living, he's past 30 years of age and he's not in the NBA anymore.

So what? Every single time K-State struggles in any capacity, our fans turn negative toward something. Last year it was Tom Asbury. In the few years before that, we'd find an opposing player or coach to pick on if things weren't going the Cats' way.

"Why?" is my question. We started Tuesday's game yelling when the All-Stars got the first possession. As soon as they scored, we shut up for the rest of the half. Here's a simple little equation: fans + cheering = better play.

I was afraid to put that in earlier columns for fear of the physics department hailing me as the next Will Hunting, a label I don't need or want.

But like some stupid, cheesy movie or play, where a pure person looks into the eyes of an evil person and says, "There's good in you, I can see it," that's the case with K-State basketball fans as well.

As the Wildcats slowly crept closer in the second half, fans slowly got louder and found something other than Robinson being washed up to chat about.

When Kelvin Howell finally tied the game with a layup at 85, with a little more than three minutes left, all 4,400 fans stood up and cheered.

If not for a fluke misunderstanding at the end of the game on a 1-and-1 free-throw situation, K-State, with its momentum coming from its own play as well as the fans, probably would have won.

Yes, it's just an exhibition game, but God bless them principles — had we yelled the entire game, K-State would have won. Easily. Like it or not, we as fans are a main reason why K-State isn't in the same class as KU or Oklahoma State or Missouri — not Tom Asbury or too many community college players or undistinguishable Bramlage Coliseum.

It's us, and we know it. More than ever, though, we're going to be tested this year. A new coaching staff, a new system, four new contributors — all adding up to a struggle at first, but one that definitely will pay dividends this season.

Sure, the California All-Stars weren't the best defensive team, but for the first time in recent memory, K-State could have two or three guys on the floor at a time who can reliably shoot the three — that hasn't been the case for some time.

Phineas Atchison is 5-for-11 on threes, Richie Terry is 3-for-7 and Larry Reid is 3-for-5 — not too shabby. If they continue at close to that pace, things will open up for Howell, Matt Siebrandt and company down low.

Trust me, K-State is not the worst team in the Big 12. The Cats have the ability to finish in the middle of the conference — quite an improvement from a season ago.

It might not be pretty at first, but for once, it would be nice if we cheered — before the team gets on a roll.

Rovelto sees success as work

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

Success is defined for many coaches in one overly simplistic manner — winning.

Whether it be basketball, bowling, football or curling, being victorious, to many, is the sole ingredient to a successful career.

K-State track and field coach Cliff Rovelto, however, subscribes to a different philosophy.

While both the men's and women's teams have enjoyed countless victories during Rovelto's tenure, a conference title or a high ranking isn't what gauges his success.

"I don't define success as the person who won the national championship," Rovelto said. "I think it's possible for someone who finished fourth in a conference meet to have achieved at a very high level."

"We measure everything against what their capabilities are. We've had people who've won conference championships who haven't performed to their level as some who've finished fourth or fifth."

While both the men's and women's programs have featured numerous conference and nationally acclaimed athletes, including several Olympians, Rovelto said the current quality of the program can be credited to all who have worked so hard, often out of the glare of the spotlight.

"I really think the success of the program has been built on those kids who've gotten third or fourth," Rovelto said. "They've really been the difference-makers for us."

Rovelto is in his 13th season coaching at K-State and his eighth as head coach. Prior to his distinguished career at K-State, Rovelto first cracked the coaching ranks at the high school level, then as a graduate assistant at the University of Kansas.

While at KU, Rovelto had the opportunity to observe and learn from then-coach Bob Timmons. Rovelto said Timmons was, and still is, one of the premiere coaches in track and field history.

"Timmons was one of the greatest ever," Rovelto said. "He taught us the values that were most important in being successful."

After seven years at KU, Rovelto was influenced by former K-State track and field coach John Capriotti to cross lines and move to Manhattan, to be an assistant coach under him.

"Capriotti and I had been friends for awhile, so we had talked about working together," Rovelto said. "To be honest, to have the opportunity to work with the staff that was here at the time was a big attraction. I've been here ever since."

Over the past decade, Rovelto has played a role in the gradual reconstruction and improvement of the track and field program.

"When I arrived, the program wasn't funded well; it wasn't even fully staffed," he said. "It really made things difficult when competing against the level of competition found in the (former) Big 8."

Setting personnel and financial matters aside, Rovelto said the biggest problem plaguing the program upon his arrival was the team's performance in the classroom and with grade point averages.

"We had people competing quite well at the conference and national level," Rovelto said, "but if you looked at the team's overall GPA, it was embarrassing. The year I started it was in the ballpark of a 2.2. That's terrible — just disgusting."

Enter Coach Rovelto. After steady progress and improvement over the years, success was being noted both on the track and in the classroom.

While athletes such as Ed Broxterman, Nathan Leeper and Amy Mortimer have notably performed well in national and international competition, it was the continued academic improvement that Rovelto said he felt most proud about.

"It's been a big commitment on behalf of the track and field staff and the student-athletes being brought into the program," Rovelto said.

The team's GPA today is much higher. "Both the women's and men's team are above a 3.0, cumulatively," he said.

Don't mistake Rovelto's ability to coach the sport of track and field, however, according to Olympian high-jumper and former K-State student Nathan Leeper.

"K-State, without a doubt, has one of the world's best track and field coaches in Rovelto," Leeper said in a pre-Olympic interview. "The university needs to realize it. We'd travel overseas to compete and everyone would recognize him and show him great respect. Here, no one seems to know who he is. K-State truly has a prized possession."

Olympic heptathlete Sheila Burrell also was quick to point out Rovelto's talent as a coach.

"The reason why I moved to Manhattan was largely due to Coach Rovelto, and being able to train with him before the (Olympic) Games," Burrell said shortly before her departure for Sydney.

Fueling Rovelto's desire to coach is a strong impulse to be a teaching figure to other coaches and athletes of all ages.

"I love to go to practice and teach," Rovelto said. "Without a doubt, that's the most enjoyable thing to me about coaching."

"Teaching. That's what we are here to do, and good coaches are good teachers, and good teachers can teach anything."

from the ground floor, you're not inheriting an All-Big 12 player or an All-American and you can look at that and say, 'boy, that's not fair.'

"But I don't think we're looking at it that way. It's really a positive challenge for us — it's building a program — it's an opportunity to do something from scratch. And we take it to heart, it's important to us that we're successful here."

That success is important to the players as well, Howell said.

"It's all about tradition and a promising future, so we all got to just come out and show the fans what we need to give them and work hard for everybody that comes to watch us."

Those who do come and watch will receive one guarantee, Wooldridge said — that his team will play hard and play together.

"We might not look pretty all the time, but we'll find a way to win," he said. "We'll dive on the floor for a ball, we'll take a charge, we'll do blue-collar things to win a ball game."

Consequently, Wooldridge said he hopes K-State fans are recharged, enthusiastic and ready to participate this season.

"I think they are. I believe they are," he said. "We have done a tremendous amount of work, all of us, in going out and meeting these people, talking to them, and basically just selling ourselves, reselling our program and inviting them to games, personally."

"I think that has a lot to do with our fan base. I think they want to know who you are, I believe that. And they want to know our kids and they want to support our kids and I think if we give them the kind of team that plays hard, plays with a blue-collar approach to the game to a certain extent, plays with a sense of pride, I think they'll eat it up, I really do."

"That's my belief, I'm counting on it. That's what we're selling to them."

three weeks, we've really been in a nice rhythm," he said. "Both offense and defense, attacking and transition. I think Disney (Bronnenberg) is doing a good job of getting the ball to the hitters where they want it."

K-State's hitters got the job done, but junior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said it was not the best technical game the Cats have had this year. She said the Cats were able to do a good job of keeping their emotional energy up, despite their huge lead.

"Usually it is tough, but we stay on each other quite a bit," Mimick said after the game. "We always push each other a little harder and you can't let up at any time. Everybody feeds off each other, and we did pretty well tonight."

Senior middle blocker Kelle Branting said she agreed the team played well and they will use this win to gain momentum and improve the team's game.

"The little details are going to be real important when it comes down to the last couple games of the season and the NCAA Tournament," she said. "It's just a good time to iron out details right now."

High school tightens security due to threats

The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Security was increased at Lawrence High School after threats of violence but only a teacher who was directly threatened was made aware of the problem, school officials said.

Even Lawrence School District Superintendent Randy Weseman said he was not told about threats promising violence Monday at Lawrence High School.

Lawrence police released their report on the threats Tuesday, a day after the danger apparently had passed but weeks after the threats were made.

High school officials said they notified a teacher who was directly threatened but didn't tell students or parents. They increased security Monday at the high school and vacated a room where the violence was threatened to start.

Weseman said he had been told that Lawrence High School Principal Dick Patterson left him a voice mail about the matter.

"At this time, I'm just confused as to what happened," Weseman said Tuesday. "I haven't received all the details, (and) that's not in accordance with procedures that I've outlined."

Detective M.T. Brown said three notes were scrawled on walls in men's bathrooms at the school. All threatened violence for Nov. 13.

Police don't have a suspect, Brown said.

Associate Principal Mike

Browning said from four to six plain-clothes police officers were in the school for several days ending Monday. The targeted teacher took the day off Monday.

Brown said students and parents weren't notified because the threats were vague and generalized.

However, Weseman said he preferred to know more — and he wants to know why he didn't.

"I don't like to do work after the fact," he said. "We deal with things head-on and in a timely way."

Talks begin to halt Middle East conflict

By BARRY SCHWEID
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON, D.C. — American mediators are launching a new drive to persuade Israel and the Palestinians to scale down their conflict and set the stage for what could be a last effort by President Clinton to oversee a peace accord.

The mediators, led by Dennis B. Ross and including White House and State Department specialists on the Middle East, plan to hold talks over several days in the region with Israeli and Palestinian officials.

They went to Israel as part of the U.S. delegation led by first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton for the funeral Wednesday of Leah Rabin, widow of the late Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin.

After the funeral, with Clinton headed to Vietnam to join her husband there, the U.S. negotiators were set to begin their intensive talks, a senior U.S. official said here.

The new drive coincides with information received by the Clinton administration that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, without issuing a public order, has instructed Palestinians to stop shooting at Israelis, said the official, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Still, the fighting was intense

Wednesday, and eight Palestinians were killed by Israeli soldiers. It was the highest death toll in a month.

Clinton spoke to Arafat twice by telephone Tuesday from Brunei, where the president was attending an economic conference with leaders of Asian and Pacific nations. They spoke for 50 minutes, and Clinton pressed him hard on the violence, the official said.

A public order by Arafat for an end to the violence is considered unlikely because, if the conflict continued, it could put him in a position of appearing to have been disobeyed.

On Tuesday, en route to Brunei, Clinton said his biggest regret as president could be his failure to reconcile Israel and the Palestinians, because he "really wanted with all my heart" to bring peace to the Middle East.

"If it doesn't happen, I'll be profoundly disappointed," he said in an interview with The Associated Press aboard Air Force One, "but I'll never regret a minute I spent on it, because I think it's very important for the future."

Clinton met with Arafat at the White House last Thursday and then with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak on Sunday. The discussions focused on exploring ways to end the eight weeks of fighting that have left more than 200 people dead, most of them Palestinians.

Thanksgiving Feast

Help offered for preparing traditional meal fixings

Mashed potatoes and gravy, stuffing, rolls and pies will line hundreds of tables next week.

But the one food that will be present for most during Thanksgiving is turkey.

For the majority of American families, turkey will be the main course for Thanksgiving dinner. According to the National Turkey Federation, 92 percent of Americans eat the meat on Thanksgiving.

"It's tradition," said Sherrie Rosenblatt, spokeswoman for the National Turkey Federation. "It's all about an American holiday with the tradition of turkey at the center of the plate."

With the U.S. Department of Agriculture estimating that 45 million turkeys will be eaten this Thanksgiving, hotlines are established to deal with all of the turkey traumas that could arise.

This year is the 20th anniversary of the Butterball Turkey hotline. The hot line has 48 home economists and dietitians on staff to field any turkey-related questions that might arise. The operators attend courses at Butterball University to learn about the latest safety and preparation techniques.

Marjorie Klindera said she has helped a number of callers make their Thanksgiving dinners a success in the 18 years she has worked for the Butterball hotline.

"It's really a pleasure to work the hot line because people are grateful for the help we give them," Klindera said.

However, Thanksgiving dinner isn't complete with just the turkey.

Other traditional favorites include sweet potatoes, cranberries, pies and dinner rolls.

Friendship House manager Becky Riniker said pumpkin pies, pecan pies and dinner rolls are popular items around Thanksgiving time.

The bakery in Wamego sells between 75 to 100 pies each Thanksgiving, although Riniker said dinner rolls are the main seller.

Homegrown sweet potatoes are the best seller for Thanksgiving dinner at the Eastside and Westside Markets.

"Every year we sell more sweet potatoes than at other holidays," owner Terry Olson said. She said another popular item includes apples for making pies.

Olson said many customers purchase Johnathan apples for their pies, but due to the warmer temperatures in the Midwest, the Jonathan crop didn't produce as well as it normally does. She said people are buying Winesap and Granny Smith apples instead.

Fresh celery for relish trays and garden homegrown onions for stuffing also are in demand.

She said potatoes, cranberries and baking nuts are traditional items that people purchase year after year.

Nutrition remains important over holidays

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

The holiday season is here.

However, the word "holiday" does not have to be defined as "weight gain."

There are ways to avoid the seven to 10 pounds that is the average gain from Thanksgiving to New Year's Day, said Mary Meck Higgins, dietician and nutrition extension specialist.

The first step is to get exercise.

"A lot of times you go to different relatives' houses and have more than just one big meal," Higgins said. "You should do exercise in between instead of just sitting around."

The exercise, however, doesn't have to be a burden, she said. It could just be taking a walk in the woods or playing with your family.

"It doesn't have to be something where you put on gym clothes," Higgins said. "Just do some physical activity. It can be a great tradition."

As students prepare to go home for a Thanksgiving dinner next week, Higgins and Barbara Lohse Knous, associate professor of human nutrition and nutrition extension specialist, offer advice to maintain a healthy holiday season.

Thanksgiving dinners made with fatty ingredients are OK as long as you look at the portion sizes, Knous said.

"There's nothing wrong with a smaller portion of mashed potatoes and gravy made with real milk," she said.

Another tip she gives is to divide the meal into courses, waiting for a couple of hours between each course.

"It can be nice to serve food in courses and draw it out a bit," Knous said. "You can wait a couple of hours after eating the meal, go for a walk, then have dessert."

Higgins said another method to keeping the meal healthy is to avoid drinking sugary drinks such as regular pop, Kool-Aid and lemonade.

"You won't feel full, but it will add a lot of calories," she said.

Some beverages she suggests are water, iced tea and fruit juices, which contain nutrition along with their calories.

Although Thanksgiving is often associated with big meals, Knous said there are other ways of making Thanksgiving less food-oriented.

"Focus on the environment to where that's just as important as the food," she said. "Involve the children in cooking something. Have them help with a nutritious item, because kids are more apt to eat what they fix."

To avoid an extra intake of calories and fat grams, Higgins said she suggests that meals concentrate around vegetables.

"When you are putting your plate together, look for different colors," Higgins said. "That's a good way to get a good balance of nutrients."

She said if you are not full by the end of your meal, you should consider a second helping of vegetables or fresh fruit.

Andrea Stiens, junior in hotel and restaurant management, said moderation is the key to having a healthy holiday.

"You should eat everything in moderation," Stiens said. "But it is OK to binge every once in a while."

Not only is the amount of calories and fat grams consumed during Thanksgiving important, but Knous said people need to take extra care with food safety.

She said people aren't used to cooking such large meals at one time with so many distractions. This can lead to mistakes in food preparation.

"We don't normally juggle seven or eight items in a row," Knous said. "We can forget about food safety and do something crazy."

Although weight gain can be a concern over the holidays, Knous emphasized that Thanksgiving still should be kept enjoyable.

"The big order of the day is to enjoy your food and be safe," she said.

Privacy growing concern for Internet domain registration

BY ANICK JESDANUH
The Associated Press

MARINA DEL REY, Calif. — As more individuals build their own Web sites, some privacy advocates now question requirements that the site owners disclose their personal contact information.

Names, e-mail addresses, postal addresses and telephone numbers for more than 24 million domain names are stored in databases called Whois. The information is available to anyone with an Internet connection.

It's like a global phone directory — without the option for an unlisted number — and can be easily accessed through servers at companies that register domain names.

"Sacrificing your privacy should not be a condition of access to the domain space," said Alan Davidson, staff counsel with the Center for Democracy and Technology.

Most people might not care and would list their contact information anyway, just like most telephone customers now list their numbers.

But Davidson said Internet users ought to have a choice — for instance, they may want to stay anonymous if they are human rights advocates and other dissidents fearful of repression from oppressive governments.

Ellen Rony, author of the Domain Name Handbook, said she knew of someone stalked based on information from the databases.

On the other hand, she said, the tool proves helpful for researchers to gauge the origins and veracity of Web sites, and the stalking incident appears an aberration.

The Internet Corporation for Assigned Names and Numbers, which oversees the master record keeper of Web addresses and the domain registration companies, currently requires disclosure of contact information for holders of .com, .net and .org names.

Andrew McLaughlin, ICANN's chief policy officer, said the organization may have to revisit Whois policies next year, but it is not on the agenda for its annual meeting this week.

Part of the drive comes from the European Union, which passed a law prohibiting the transfer of data to the United States and other non-EU countries that don't meet EU standards for protecting personal information.

In the 1980s, when the Whois database was developed, Internet privacy wasn't a big deal. The Internet was mostly a research tool for government and universities.

"We all knew each other," said Karl Auerbach, a longtime Internet user who was recently elected to ICANN.

But these days, Auerbach said, that same Whois database creates unwanted e-mail and unsolicited phone calls.

Davidson said times have changed, and the Internet must change as well.

"Now, you have regular people using it and there's a much greater need to protect privacy," he said.

Registration companies offer access to the databases in order to let users determine whether the domain names they want are available. But when a name is taken, the registrar often links to the records for that name as well.

The idea is to help users contact the name's owner for possible purchase, even though the databases originally helped computer administrators contact one another when networks go awry.

Lawyers also use the databases to check on names that may tread on their clients' trademark rights. Steven J. Metalitz, vice president for the International Intellectual Property Alliance, said such open access is important to deter abusers.

At VeriSign Global Registry Services, which runs the databases for .com, .net and .org, Vice President Chuck Gomes said technology might settle the issue in the next year or two.

New tools, he said, could help meet the needs of law enforcement officials and trademark owners while protecting privacy for individuals in other circumstances.

In the meantime, the records remain open, and many of the proposals for new domain suffixes call for open Whois databases as well.

"It's the model that's out there," said John Kane, head of a marketing task force for Afilias, which is seeking a .web suffix. "It's a public resource. You don't own a domain name. You own the right to use it."

Award-winning country trio excites crowd of all ages

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

There were more than three chicks at the Thursday night Bramlage Coliseum concert.

A group of more than 20 members of Kappa Kappa Gamma lined the second row of the Dixie Chicks concert wearing black shirts adorned with sequins spelling "Kappa Chicks" across their chests.

Kacy Gillogly, junior in advertising, was one of four sorority sisters who camped near Bramlage for the tickets. She said after the four found out they were not allowed to camp near the coliseum doors, they found a spot close to the parking lot to spend the night.

"We slept in the car," Gillogly said. "This is serious business, and I knew we had to get the tickets."

Katie Boese, sophomore in elementary education, also camped out to buy tickets for herself and her Kappa sisters.

"It was the first time I ever camped out, and I had the time of my life," she said. "Then I made a countdown for the Dixie Chicks, and we started at 30 days."

Thirty days later, a crowd of all ages filled the coliseum to hear the Grammy award-winning trio. Vida, a Tex-Mex band from San Antonio, served as the opening act for the 7:30 p.m. concert. The artists were in Manhattan as part of their 38-state MusicCountry.com-sponsored tour.

After their short set, crew members prepared the stage for the headlining act. Nathan, a cast member from the Seattle-

Shalala to speak today in McCain

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Americans are more likely to be affected by programs under the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, which Donna Shalala directs, than any other other Cabinet department.

Although more than a dozen Cabinet members have spoken as Landon lecturers, Shalala, who will speak at 2 p.m. today in McCain Auditorium, will be the first secretary of her department to speak in the series.

Shalala has not released the topic of her speech.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the lecture series, said he doesn't think students know the scope of the department and how it might touch their lives.

The department is second only to the Department of Defense in spending, with an annual budget of $387 billion.

Some of the department's divisions include National Institutes of Health; Food and Drug Administration; Centers for Disease Control and Prevention; Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration; and the Administration for Children and Families, which administers the Head Start program.

Its services stretch from birth to death with programs aimed at prenatal care and infant health to Social Security and Medicare. The department also administers federal welfare and Medicaid programs.

"It affects everyone," Reagan said, "parents, children neighbors and co-workers."

Shalala, who has had the position since 1993, is the longest-serving secretary in the history of the department.

Under her leadership, poverty rates have declined to the lowest levels since 1979, teen pregnancy and drug use have declined, and child immunization rates have increased to the highest levels in history, according to the department's Web site.

Before Shalala's tenure in Washington, D.C., she was the chancellor of the University of Wisconsin-Madison. Her credentials also include service as an assistant secretary for the Department of Housing and Urban Development during the Carter administration.

K-State chose Shalala to speak because of her place in government but also because of the prominence issues like Social Security and prescription drugs for seniors have played in the recent presidential election.

Students angry with elimination of college sports

The Associated Press

McPHERSON, Kan. — Students are angry after the president of McPherson College decided to eliminate three sports teams from this private college in an effort to provide scholarships for other athletes.

But Scott McDearmon, McPherson College student body president, says his classmates are more upset about how the programs were ended.

"I think students were kind of upset about how the announcement came out," McDearmon said. "As facts are coming out, students are being informed that the situation regarding athletic scholarships is trying to do the best for the college."

College president Gary Dill said the cuts were part of the college's strategic planning beginning in the fall of 1999. He assumed coaches and students were included in conversations about use of the limited resources.

But few — including the school's athletic director — knew the cuts had been finalized until Nov. 7, when they were announced.

"The communications broke down a little," said Dan Hoffman, athletics director. "I'd been involved in some of the meetings when recommendations were made to the Florida ballot recounts allowed, might not be counted in official results

By ANNE GEARAN
The Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Florida's high court gave the go-ahead Thursday to ballot recounts in the state's chaotic presidential election but left unanswered the question of whether the results will matter.

"There is no legal impediment to the recounts continuing," the court said in a case brought by Palm Beach County. Within minutes, county officials announced they would join adjacent Broward County in reviewing hundreds of thousands of ballots by hand.

The Palm Beach count began Thursday evening. A state judge was to decide as early as Friday whether to overturn the Republican secretary of state's decision to reject any further recount totals from Democratic-controlled counties.

In the overtime campaign between George W. Bush and Al Gore, the ruling was a victory for the vice president, who had pressed for manual recounts in four counties in hopes of overturning the Texas governor's 300-vote lead. About 2,600 overseas absentee ballots remain to be counted, but so far there is no dispute about them.

"The Supreme Court's clear and unambiguous ruling that the counties are authorized to proceed with a manual recount is a victory for everyone who wants to see the votes counted clearly and fairly here in Florida," Gore campaign chairman William Daley said.

Republicans called the decision unimportant.

"The one-paragraph, interim order of the Florida Supreme Court has just been presented to you as the best thing since night baseball," said Bush's recount manager, former Secretary of State James A. Baker III. He said, in fact, the order "does nothing more than preserve the status quo."

Bush running mate Dick Cheney said the state's official count and recount showed Bush was the winner — with the overseas absenteees still to come — and barring any change he expected Secretary of State Katherine Harris to declare Bush the winner on Saturday.

Cheney said in an interview with Fox News Channel that recounts by hand do not give a more accurate result. "It is no longer really counting. It is manipulation," he said.

The seven-member Florida court, all chosen by Democratic governors, issued its unanimous, one-paragraph order as Bush lawyers looked to a federal appeals court in Atlanta to stop the recounts altogether.

One of the four counties, Volusia, completed its new tally in time to meet a 5 p.m. Tuesday deadline established by Harris. She has said the state will not include any of the post-Tuesday recount figures in its official tabulation.

In Miami-Dade county, officials said they would meet Friday to decide whether to proceed.

Collision of fighter jet, small plane kills 1 pilot

SARASOTA, Fla. — An Air Force F-16 collided with a small plane Thursday and crashed. One person aboard the small plane was killed, while the fighter pilot parachuted to safety and walked to someone's house to use the phone.

Pieces of the small plane, a Cessna, landed on a golf course. The wreckage of the fighter jet started a fire in the woods a few miles away.

Gerald Rivera was working on a construction site nearby.

"We asked the pilot if he was OK and he said, 'Yeah,'" Rivera told the Sarasota Herald Tribune.

The Air Force said the jet was from Moody Air Force Base in Valdosta, Ga., but was on a training mission that originated from Florida's MacDill Air Force Base, about 20 miles from the crash site.

Sheriff Charles Wells said two F-16s were on the training mission but only one was involved in the crash.

Don McIlwain, who lives nearby, said he saw the two military jets and then noticed a smaller plane that looked as if it would cross their path. McIlwain said he remembered thinking, "I hope it's high enough."

"Just as I said that, he went right through it," McIlwain told the Tribune. "The small plane just disintegrated."

In August, there were three U.S. crashes involving F-16s.

Coca-Cola settles suit, owes workers millions

ATLANTA — The Coca-Cola Co. agreed to pay $192.5 million to settle a racial discrimination suit by black workers.

The settlement, announced Thursday, includes $113 million in cash, $43.5 million to adjust salaries, and $36 million for oversight of the company's employment practices.

Coke also will pay $20 million in attorneys' fees and plans to donate $50 million to its foundation for community programs. And it agreed to create an ombudsman post and have its employment practices reviewed by an outside group.

Shares of Coca-Cola were up 12.5 cents to $61.63 in afternoon trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

The settlement was given preliminary approval by U.S. District Judge Richard Story, in whose court the suit was filed in April 1999. Details of the settlement will be sent to about 2,000 current and former employees beginning next month.

The lawsuit claimed Coca-Cola discriminated against salaried black employees in pay, promotions and evaluations. The company denied the claims. The settlement covers salaried black employees in the United States who worked for Coke between April 1995 and June 2000.

The seven-member watchdog group, charged with making sure Coca-Cola is fair in pay, promotions and performance evaluations, was a centerpiece of the settlement. The task force will recommend changes and ensure they are carried out; Coke retains the option of challenging changes it feels are not financially or technically feasible.

A toll-free telephone line will be established to receive complaints 24 hours a day.

The task force is modeled after a similar group established four years ago in the settlement of a discrimination lawsuit against Texaco. Coca-Cola's will include former government officials in labor and civil rights, professors, lawyers and diversity consultants.

U.S., Yugoslavia re-open embassies, restore ties

WASHINGTON, D.C. — After an exchange of diplomatic letters, the United States and Yugoslavia will re-establish a relationship that soured in the conflict over Kosovo: They will reopen their embassies in each other's capital within the next few days.

President Vojislav Kostunica said his government would focus its relations mostly on Europe and Russia, while also forging ties with "the most powerful country in the world — the United States," and others.

Earlier, the Yugoslav government announced it was ready to restore diplomatic relations with Germany, France and Britain as well.

Still, more than a hint of discord remains. Kostunica has refused to send Slobodan Milosevic and a handful of the former president's loyalists to The Hague, Netherlands, for trial on war crimes charges.

Kostunica has said they should face justice in Yugoslavia. But Foreign Minister Goran Svilanovic on Thursday said visas would be issued to tribunal personnel to reopen an office in Belgrade.

"I'm not aware that the new government has fully moved ahead on a number of matters," a State Department spokesman, Philip Reeker, said while welcoming Belgrade's invitation to renew ties that Milosevic suspended under bombardment by NATO warplanes last year.

The assault, led by the United States, forced Milosevic to withdraw Serb troops and special police from Kosovo, where they had been accused of repression of secession-minded ethnic Albanians, who comprise a

Trainers focus on medical aspect

■ Men's basketball team benefits from training, skill of K-State graduate.

By DALAENA NEFF
Kansas State Collegian

It's more than just taping ankles.

It's about long hours and constant learning, but it's what Daren Badura, assistant athletic trainer, enjoys doing.

Badura, assistant athletic trainer for the K-State men's basketball team, said most people think an athletic trainer's job is only about taping and conditioning.

"That's a whole other entity," he said. "The strength and conditioning coaches do that part. Our focus is on the medical aspect of the athlete."

As the husband of his high school sweetheart and father to their 10-month-old son, plus working 12-hour days, Badura's life is far from boring.

Badura has a bachelor's degree in kinesiology with a minor in business and a master's of science in counseling and student personnel services, all from K-State. Working for your alma mater is a little unusual, Badura said, but he is happy with his collegiate-level job.

Badura said he played sports during high school, but when he got to college, he got involved with the medical aspect.

"I obviously didn't have the talent to go on, and I wanted to stay involved with sports and I really enjoyed medicine — that's the perfect combination," he said.

Badura entered K-State's undergraduate athletic training program in the last two years of his graduate study.

"You have to work with the teams for two years and have around 800 hours of work as an undergraduate," Badura said.

One month before Badura graduated, he took the national certification exam, which would certify him as an athletic trainer. Badura said he passed the three-part exam the first time. He was happy because only about 40 percent pass all three parts the first time, he said.

As a graduate assistant, Badura said he would work 80 hours a week, along with six to nine hours of graduate school every semester.

Badura now is a full-time, certified athletic trainer. His day starts at 7:30 a.m. and doesn't end until 7:30 or 8 p.m. He begins with the first evaluation and treatment of the injured athletes. Badura said he sees a lot of ankle, foot and lower body injuries, due to the amount of running the athletes do.

Badura said he then must contact the coaches to discuss the players' injuries.

"It's a mutual decision on whether or not the guy can practice. I'm the medical say of all the decisions," he said. "Athletic training is recognized by the American Medical Association. We are recognized as medical practitioners," he said.

Another evaluation and treatment is done after the athlete's classes, and before practice.

"We need to get the taping done before practice," he said. "Taping is just a small portion of our job, that's just what everybody sees."

Badura attends every practice and every game the team plays.

"I make sure everyone is healthy and if anyone gets hurt, I am there to evaluate them," he said.

Badura said he enjoys traveling with the team.

"That's the fun part of the job, traveling to the different arenas and schools," he said.

A lot of paperwork also is involved with Badura's profession.

"I have to update files and write injury reports," he said. "We have to document everything we do. It takes a long time."

Badura's job is not over when the six-month season ends, either.

"I deal with the long term rehabilitations, and get them repaired from the season and try to prevent further injuries," he said. "It's a lot of maintenance and prevention. I'm just here to keep them healthy."

Badura said he is happy staying in Manhattan, even though his college career was here.

"Things just opened up here. Great opportunities opened up when I finished my degrees," he said.

Badura said his advice to anyone interested in athletic training is to keep on learning, even after they are in the profession.

"Never stop learning. Always ask questions and get involved with the teams, doctors and other trainers — learn what they know," he said.

"I learn something new every day in this field. If you say you know it all, then there is something wrong."

Tina Patti, a graduate assistant trainer for the baseball team, said Badura teaches her a lot about training.

"He has a lot of knowledge and always tests me. He has a lot of interesting points," she said. "He has a different perspective. There is stuff he does that I was never exposed to."

Jeff Ferguson, director of sports medicine, said Badura was the perfect fit for the job as men's basketball trainer.

"He's devoted to Coach Wooldridge and his staff and to his work with the athletes. He's a great asset to my staff and we are fortunate to have him," he said.

Manhattan resident to cast electoral vote

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

The recount of presidential votes in Florida continues, but members of the Electoral College in Kansas are preparing to make a trip to Topeka to cast their final ballots.

Kansas has six electoral voters, and one of them is right here in Manhattan. The chairman of the Riley County Republican Party, Charles Hostetler, was chosen to represent his party in the Electoral College process.

"The state Republican party chose me," Hostetler said. "We were picked because of our loyalty to the party."

Karl Austin, executive director of the Kansas Republican Party, said Hostetler was chosen because of his dedication.

"He has been involved in the Kansas Republican Party for many years," Austin said. "He's the current chairman for the Riley County Republican Party, and he does good work for the Kansas party."

Austin said that while Hostetler was chosen for his lifetime contributions, he also was picked because of his recent contributions to the party.

"He's a good county chair," Austin said. "He gets his precincts filled and gets people to meetings. He's just good to work with."

Hostetler's job will not begin until Dec. 18, when he heads to Topeka. There, he will meet up with the other five electors, and they will cast their votes for Texas Gov. George W. Bush.

"On Election Day, I voted just like everyone else," Hostetler said. "I just have to go to Topeka with all the other electors to cast the electoral vote."

Both the Democratic and Republican parties chose six electors before the election. Hostetler said the candidate who receives the most popular votes is what decides which party's electors will cast the state's six votes. Bush

"As close as this race is now, if it were just the popular vote, they would be recounting everywhere."

— Charles Hostetler, chairman of the Riley County Republican party

won the popular vote in Kansas, so the Republicans will be casting the electoral votes.

Austin said she was sure Hostetler would do his job well.

"He will do a great job as an elector, just as he's done a great job being chairman," Austin said.

Hostetler said the electors in Kansas are not legally bound to vote for the candidate who receives the most popular votes in the state.

"We didn't sign a pledge, so we're not legally bound, but we are morally bound," Hostetler said. "We indicated that we would vote for our candidate."

Even with the controversy in Florida, Hostetler said he still supports the Electoral College.

"It's worked for the last 200 years," Hostetler said. "I think it gives the small states more of a voice. As close as the race is now, if it were just the popular vote, they would be recounting everywhere."

McPherson College made poor decision

Students, athletes and coaches at McPherson College have every reason to be upset.

The president of the private school decided to eliminate three sports teams in an effort to provide other athletes with scholarships.

The announcement was a surprise to many of McPherson's 485 students. Even the university's athletic director did not even know the cuts had been finalized until they were announced earlier this month. The director was not even given the courtesy of knowing about his department's future prior to others.

Later, a mass e-mail was sent out in an attempt to apologize for the way the message was received.

The decision that McPherson College made was an expensive one.

It might be saving the university $50,000, but it is costing many student athletes. Some athletes are opting to transfer to other colleges at semester's end, while others are able to benefit from the downsizing.

College president Gary Dill said the cuts are an attempt to help boost the college's competitiveness in terms of obtaining prospective student athletes. However, deciding one sport is more important than another might cost McPherson College a few prospective students as athletes search for a more supportive school.

KELLIE FARRELL / Collegian

Holiday reminder of many reasons to be thankful

Manhattan's Wal-Mart recently began a new policy of keeping its doors open 24 hours a day.

We finally will be able to buy school supplies, beef jerky, cheap clothing, garden equipment and ammunition at 4 a.m. — and all in one convenient location.

Sarcasm aside, this will be useful for many K-State students. After all, everyone has been in the middle of an all-nighter when they realized they needed one more supply.

While everyone remembers to be thankful for the big stuff at Thanksgiving — family, friends, love, wealth, happiness and freedom — many people often overlook the smaller things, such as extended hours at the local Wal-Mart.

I, therefore, would like to take this opportunity to point out a few of the smaller reasons to be thankful this year.

■ "Star Trek Voyager" will go off of the air at the end of this season.

That means one less annoying alien show clogging the airwaves for those of us who aren't "Star Trek" gurus. It also means a long-awaited opportunity to exhale for the many Trekkies who haven't missed a show during the past six seasons.

■ The K-State-Nebraska game Saturday is one those in attendance will never forget. I'm still a little woozy after head-butting "Crazy Larry" in the stands during the game, but University Counseling Services now will have far fewer football fans in its waiting room, standing on the brink of insanity.

■ Louise Averill's cat died. Although I, like many of you, am deeply saddened by the loss of one of our beloved feline friends, this particular Burmese cat took one for the team: after its death, Averill donated $2 million to K-State's College of Veterinary Medicine. Had the cat survived, that money might well have gone to Fancy Feast and yarn.

■ We still don't know who will be the next president. Many Americans were frightened at the prospect of Al Gore leading the nation; others feared George W. Bush at the helm. Everyone can rest easy — it looks as though Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert might have to assume the role.

■ Denison Hall's recent skirmish with a heating pipe — which the heating pipe won with water as its weapon — could move the building yet another step closer to demolition. Actually, talks have gone on about demolishing the building since long before I arrived at K-State, and they will continue long after my departure. At least some students who have class in the building have a reason to be thankful — they had class canceled.

■ Students will not have to fund a new student activities center. Instead, their money can be used for more worthwhile ventures, such as funding research for cold fusion, searching for the elusive Loch Ness Monster or simply setting the money ablaze.

■ Tom Asbury is gone. The basketball team might not have had a stellar preseason once again, but at least coach Jim Wooldridge is a more fan-friendly coach who will not alienate the few fans who still take an active interest in K-State basketball.

■ The end of the semester is only about a month away. Finally, a chance to do ... anything else.

I paid $150 to have full Internet access in the dorms. If they are going to take away Napster, I want my money back.

Is it me, or is "South Park" the most politically active TV show on television?

Bush and Gore. They're both four-letter words.

This message is for all those freshmen who are thinking about changing their major to sociology: don't, unless you want to write 5 million papers.

My Napster is faster than Speedy Gonzales. But oh wait, I don't live in the dorms.

I don't know how anybody is supposed to concentrate on writing a paper when they are always using the jackhammers on the eighth floor of Haymaker.

Why in the hell would anyone pay $50 to stay in Riley County Jail for the weekend?

Jeff Elliott, thank you very, very much for your column on abortion. You said what needed to be said.

I know why they haven't announced anything about Napster. They were pretending to have it shut down this whole time, when they really just figured out how to do it. Boy, we have a great computer department.

Ticket information will be available directly after the game, huh? I see. So all us people trekking to Missouri to watch the game won't have a chance in getting any one of those 1,000 tickets. Now that seems backwards to me.

Hey, Jeff Elliott, it takes two to tango.

Education key to understanding between people of all races, beliefs

The dictionary gives the following definition for the word "hate": intense hostility and aversion; distaste coupled with sustained ill will; a very strong dislike.

One key word that is missing from this definition is ignorance, or an overall lack of education.

Frank Meeink, a former skinhead who spoke Tuesday in the Union Main Ballroom had a quote that sums this up. He said, "Anything I never thought about or knew about, I hated."

When you allow yourself to hate someone, you are letting them control you.

Booker T. Washington once said, "I will permit no man to narrow and degrade my soul by making me hate him."

Hate-inspired crimes can happen anywhere. According to the intelligence project found at the Web site www.splcenter.org/intelligenceproject/ip-index, there were several hate crimes that happened in Kansas last year.

They stated that last October, racial slurs were spray-painted on the window of a 17-year-old black student's car in Andover.

In January, three men from Kansas City, were charged with conspiring to threaten and intimidate, as well as interfere with a family's civil rights, when they allegedly burned a cross in front of a black family's residence.

In March, two Wichita men pleaded guilty to conspiracy to oppress, threaten and intimidate Jewish people after they defaced a synagogue earlier in the year.

These are just a few of numerous examples of hate crimes.

When I think of a group that displays hate, my first thoughts stem to those in the Ku Klux Klan. This group that represents hate is one I immediately associate with a lack of knowledge.

According to its Web site, the KKK believes that "the white race is the irreplaceable hub of our nation, our faith and the high levels of western culture and technology."

A special report prepared by the Southern Poverty Law Center said the KKK was formed after the Civil War.

According to the Web site, "The Klan grew out of white southern anger over the Civil War defeat and the reconstruction that followed."

It is sad to note that anger has not ceased, but instead changed formats to a certain degree.

According to a program that ran on Wednesday evening on the Discovery channel there are 10,000 members of the Klan.

Ten thousand people stuck in a mindset imprisoned by ignorance.

Ten thousand people trapped in a world of hatred.

Ten thousand people who automatically judge others by the color of their skin or their religious beliefs.

They claim to educate people, to inform them. Yet they are the ones who need to be educated; they are the ones who need to be informed.

Everyone has the right to free speech, but if you truly agree with what your actions and words say there are certain things that you do.

One of those things is you let yourself, your image, be known along with your beliefs. With that being said, the members of the Klan — if they are so proud of their beliefs — should not continue with rallying or "educating" others until they make one change in their appearance.

The first thing they should do is take off their hoods. If they have enough confidence and pride in their beliefs, this will be an easy task for them to accomplish.

As for now, their masks are allowing their ignorance, thus their hatred, to be spoken, but at the same time refusing to let it be seen.

Reader gives thoughts on abortion issue, says women should consider options well

Editor,

Pro-choice proponents can claim all the rhetoric they want to defend their position. For a mother to argue "my body, my choice" is irresponsible.

Because an unwanted or unexpected child does not fit into a person's life path does not allow that person to terminate the child's life. Why should the unborn child pay for a person's irresponsible choice? The argument is made that women and girls will go to illegal means to get an abortion should it be made illegal.

Let them save themselves the trip by going to the drugstore and investing in a box of condoms. If they don't, who will? The guy at the bar who professes his love and undying devotion and then cannot remember your name or the name of the bar he picked you up in?

Protect yourself when you can and don't rely on anybody else. If you don't, don't take it out on the unborn child. I understand that rape and other sexual crimes have the ability to lead to an unwanted pregnancy. I understand that many people feel that this is an acceptable exception in allowing abortions. Many people supporting this position explain that the child would be a constant reminder of their traumatic experience.

I ask, "Why not carry the child to term and allow it to be adopted?" The child is not an immediate reminder of the experience and is still in possession of their lives. I am not going to pretend that I know all about this. I don't. But I have known people who have had abortions who regret it so much in later years that they require counseling to deal with the trauma of the abortion who, upon looking back, would have rather given the child up for adoption rather than be responsible for the unborn child's death.

Finally, in the case of the medical condition that would kill the mother if the child is carried to term, abortion should be allowed. It is a rare occurrence that this would happen, relative to the number of births a year. Given the choice of death or self-preservation, I wouldn't expect anything less from a mother given the choice between her life or the life of her unborn child. Either way, the choice is a difficult one and should not be addressed lightly.

Chief organizer of King demonstrations dies of cancer

By KRISTEN WYATT
The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Hosea Williams, the fiery lieutenant to Martin Luther King Jr. who was at the forefront of the civil rights struggle for more than three decades, died of cancer Thursday. He was 74.

Williams died at Atlanta's Piedmont Hospital, where he was admitted for an infection Oct. 20.

"We were with him when he was absent with body and were present when the Lord took him," said Williams' daughter, Elisabeth Williams-Omilami. "He was selfless. What he did for this earth will now reveal itself because the fruit of the seeds he sowed will begin to emerge."

The chief organizer of King's marches and demonstrations, Williams helped lead the "Bloody Sunday" march in Selma, Ala.,

He recalled his anger that day during a 1993 interview with The Associated Press: "I was wishing I could pull some molecules out of the air and make me a weapon and just wipe out every white person near, because I thought they had shot Dr. King at that time."

"I said to myself, 'America, racists, economic exploiters, you sure have messed up now ... because there lies the only one among us, the main one, who has tried to keep us calm. Now you've killed him.'"

The shot, he said, ended King's dream because it fragmented his lieutenants.

Williams was born Jan. 5, 1926, in Attapulgus, Ga., the illegitimate son of a blind girl who fled a state training school when she discovered she was pregnant. He was raised by his grandfather, whom he described as a tough man who killed at least three people.

A drifter who had odd jobs across Florida, Williams entered the Army, was badly wounded in Europe and returned to Georgia, where he was beaten bloody while trying to use a whites-only drinking fountain at a bus station in Americus.

Williams later finished high school and Morris Brown College, teaching agricultural chemistry before joining the civil rights movement. He recalled his children crying in a Savannah drug store when he told them they could not join white children spinning on soda counter stools because of segregation rules.

Williams helped lead the 1965 march across the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma. All-white Alabama state troopers and sheriff's deputies used tear gas, nightsticks and whips to break up the march protesting the denial of voting rights to blacks.

Two decades later, Williams led a march into virtually all-white Forsyth County north of Atlanta and was greeted by Ku Klux Klansmen and sympathizers throwing bottles and rocks.

As he ducked the projectiles, he recalled, he was thinking of King.

"I know that old rascal was just a-laughin'. Yeah, old King just a-layin' there in that grave. He was just tickled to death. Old Hosea is still trying," Williams said.

In 1977, he was ousted as executive director of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference by then-President Joseph Lowery in a power struggle. Officially, the reason was that he was not devoting full time to the job. It took a court order to get Williams to vacate his office.

Williams later entered politics, serving as a state representative, Atlanta city councilman and DeKalb County commissioner before retiring from politics in 1994. He also operated a company that specialized in cleaning supplies and a bonding company.

Williams managed to stay in the public eye through his holiday dinners for the poor, which fed thousands each year, and through '60s-style symbolic gestures, such as jailhouse fasts or camping out atop King's tomb. The dinners are run, for now, by his daughter.

MAKING THINGS HAPPEN

Quincy Morgan's playmaking ability wreaks havoc on defenses

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Nebraska might not know just how close it was to winning last Saturday.

The Cornhuskers led 14-7 halfway through the second quarter and had K-State backed up on its own 2-yard line, facing third-and-24. From that position, the Cats wouldn't get their full 16-yard depth on a punt, and up until that point, the K-State offense had gained all of 47 yards.

The advantage was all Nebraska, but then-offensive coordinator Ron Hudson made the call that would change the game. He instructed quarterback Jonathan Beasley to just heave it downfield.

"Let's go ahead and wing it out there," Hudson said to head coach Bill Snyder prior to the play. "If it's incomplete, OK, we live with it. They may intercept it. OK, it's as good as a punt."

That was the thinking behind the play that would begin a 10-point run and give K-State the halftime lead.

Receiver Quincy Morgan raced down the left sideline, got behind a fallen Nebraska defensive back, and made a leaping 35-yard catch — all without ever seeing Beasley.

"The main thing was that when I ran my route and I broke off, I couldn't even see Beasley or the ball," Morgan said. "I just saw it coming from the air, and once I saw it, I just reached up and grabbed it."

That's all there was to it. "I just threw it in the general area where I thought he would be, and he was able to make the catch," Beasley said.

That play alone might have given the Cats a chance at a Big 12 Championship at the Husker's expense. But that's Quincy Morgan, fullback Roc Cartwright said.

"We kind of know when we need a big play, and we know Quincy's there for the ball no matter what the situation is," he said. "Quincy's a playmaker. Big-time players make plays. That's what we always say, that we need a playmaker. And when it came down to the big game, Quincy made plays. He's made plays the whole season."

Morgan's seven catches for 199 yards certainly attest that he made plays all night against Nebraska. He beat the Husker defenders down the field on deep passes, out-jumped them on passes up for grabs and broke their tackles after catching the ball on short, crossing routes. It makes no difference to Morgan what routes he runs, just as long as he makes the play.

"I love to go deep on somebody and be wide open and catch the ball and try to outrun them, or catch the slip screen and try to find a crease," Morgan said. "They're both the same to me. It's a great adrenaline rush."

His greatest ability, however, lies in gaining yards after the catch, Morgan said.

"I think that's my main strength. Once I catch it, I get upfield," he said. "I think it helps me to be able to read blocks. Once I'm running, I can read the holes, the creases upfield. When somebody has a man locked on, I'm able to cut off him or go around."

Hudson took that statement one step further and said Morgan's knack for running through would-be tacklers will make him a valuable asset in the NFL.

"He's a young man that has pro potential. I think he knows that if you get him the ball, he'll make some things happen, and that's what happened," Hudson said.

"When we get the ball to him out in space, things do happen."

"He can play at the next level."

You can't coach what he can do with

Quick facts

- K-State is coming off a 29-28 win over Nebraska on Saturday, which is only the team's second victory over the Huskers in 32 years.
- With the win over the Nebraska, K-State controls its own destiny in representing the North Division in the Dr. Pepper Big 12 Championship on Dec. 2, in Kansas City, Mo. The Wildcats can secure a ticket to the conference title game with a victory Saturday over Missouri in Columbia.
- K-State's game against the Tigers will complete the Cats' longest regular season in school history — 12 games. It remains possible that K-State could play 14 games this season, which would surpass the 13 games played by the 1998 squad. They also have a chance to finish with a school-record 12 victories.
- The Wildcats have won nine games for the eighth consecutive season. Since 1993, only Florida and Florida State have claimed nine wins in all eight of those seasons.
- Senior David Allen needs just 57 yards to break the NCAA career punt return record of 1,695 yards by Lee Nalley of Vanderbilt (1947-49).
- Missouri snapped a four-game losing streak as well as an eight-game road losing skid last week with a 47-22 victory at Baylor. The Tigers are 2-3 at home this season and sit in a tie for fifth in the Big 12 North Division.

Injury report

■ Junior free safety Jon McGraw left the Nebraska game last weekend with 5:04 remaining in the first quarter, following a collision with Husker I-back Dan Alexander. The injury appeared to be to McGraw's shoulder and he did not return. Head coach Bill Snyder said McGraw should be able to play against Missouri this Saturday.

■ Snyder confirmed Tuesday that fullback Johnno Lazetich, who hasn't seen action since suffering a concussion in the Oklahoma game, will be out the rest of his senior season.

"Johnno has completed his career," Snyder said. "He's a tremendous young guy, and when you don't have something that you've had the past years you realize how much you really miss it, and we certainly do, but it's in his best interest."

Pressure on as Wildcats prepare for 2nd, final chance for Big 12 berth

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head coach Bill Snyder taught his football team an important lesson this season.

"I told our players, 'In life you don't always get second chances, and we're fortunate that we do,'" he said.

Despite losses to Oklahoma and Texas A&M in 2000, K-State will be playing for a berth in the Big 12 Championship game this weekend when the Wildcats travel to Columbia, Mo., to take on Missouri.

K-State holds its destiny in its own hands, something quarterback Jonathan Beasley said he and his teammates are quite comfortable with.

"I think any team likes to have their own destiny in their own hands," he said. "We do have it in our hand and we have to go out there this Saturday and play a tough game, and prepare ourselves the best that we can."

That preparation will be important in facing Mizzou, senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said, as K-State must build upon the new attitude it developed after the A&M loss.

"As a team, we kind of talked together and we were like, 'all right, we can either make the best of this, or we can just forget it,'" Cooper said. "And there were too many people on this team with too much pride, and us putting too much time and effort into this team and our teammates to just let it go, so we're not going to do that."

Adding even more fuel to the fire is the fact K-State players have not yet forgotten their near loss to the Tigers in Columbia two years ago.

"When you look past somebody, then that's the team that's going to beat you, and they almost did beat us," Cooper said of the '98 game against MU. "We are by no means looking past Missouri."

Not to say K-State looked past the Tigers two seasons ago, but the Cats headed into that game ranked No. 1 in the nation with an undefeated 10-0 record, and barely held off a Mizzou comeback to claim a narrow 31-25 victory.

In similar circumstances to this season, that '98 game against the Tigers also followed an emotional K-State win over Nebraska.

K-State's defense tackles Missouri running back Zain Gilmore on Nov. 20 last season at KSU Stadium. Gilmore is Missouri's leading rusher this season with 129 carries for 572 yards and seven touchdowns.

In turn, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said the Cat players will be faced with the challenge of not suffering an emotional hangover from the Nebraska win.

"I think that's, to a certain degree, human nature after an emotional win like that," Hudson said, "and that's part of our job as coaches to make sure that these players don't let that happen, and for the players to be sure within themselves that they don't let that happen."

K-State can't allow themselves to fall

See MISSOURI on PAGE 8

Ignoring Husker victory key to win

Let's hope 1998 and 2000 have no correlation. Two years ago, K-State took its perfect 10-0 record and No. 1 national ranking down to Columbia, riding high after a 40-30 win over Nebraska that snapped a 29-game losing streak to the Big Red.

The result — the Wildcats squeaked out a 31-25 victory over Missouri, and it didn't get any better from there.

K-State followed with a loss to Texas A&M in the Big 12 Championship, and capped off a tragic ending to the season with a 37-34 defeat at the hands of unranked Purdue in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl.

My point is, after the melodramatic victory over Nebraska, the Cats' season seemed to wash down the drain.

So, as ironic as it might seem, K-State's victory over the Huskers last Saturday could potentially prove negative for the Wildcats this weekend.

Yes, you heard me right, my friends. Wins do work two ways — they can either can help or hurt a program in its next outing.

Obviously, it's easy to recognize the positives, as an emotional win can ultimately give a ball club a burst of momentum and energy, but the underlying negatives might be a little harder to detect.

More often than not, a big win leaves a squad with a hangover effect, so to speak. They come out with less focus and concentration, and as a result, many dreams come crashing down and many hearts are broken.

Consequently, as much as K-State fans enjoyed the Husker victory Saturday (as well as the aftermath in Aggieville), they don't want a repeat of '98.

Senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper assures that won't happen, as he said the team is focusing on Missouri and absolutely nothing, not even a potential Big 12 Championship berth, down the road.

"They played Nebraska down to the wire this year," Cooper said of Missouri, "so they're a good team. They're probably the best 3-7 team in this country."

See BOSS on PAGE 8

DEREK BOSS

Missouri win possible, not probable

Let's get a few things straight right away. Will K-State beat Missouri on Saturday? Probably. Will K-State beat Missouri very, very badly Saturday? Most likely.

Will we need a recount to determine exactly how many points the Wildcats actually scored? Don't rule out the possibility.

It might not seem like I'm being positive about MU's chances. But notice how I used words like "probably" and "likely"?

Two weeks ago, I wouldn't have given Mizzou any chance of taking out the No. 9 Wildcats. But now I'm not going to rule them out.

K-State, following its huge victory over Nebraska last week, can wrap up a spot in the Big 12 title game with a win over the Tigers this week.

It seems like that should be enough motivation for the Wildcats. But strangely enough, K-State's motivation also is Mizzou's motivation.

The Tigers know a win over K-State most likely will knock the Wildcats out of the Big 12 title game and back into the Alamo Bowl.

A win knocks K-State out of a possible BCS berth, something that has been just out of reach for the Wildcats the last few years.

If that's not enough motivation, all MU needs to do is look back at their past two meetings with K-State.

In 1998, the No. 1 Wildcats came to Columbia and narrowly escaped with a 31-25 win.

With a packed house and a national television audience, MU took the Wildcats down to the last minute, almost pulling off the upset.

Last year, um, well, I don't feel like talking about last year. I think 66-0 talks for itself.

And if that's not enough motivation, they will be fighting for Larry Smith's job. Maybe.

It's likely that Smith is gone after this season. But a win over K-State just might save the coach whom the players love so much.

Smith, however, didn't exactly help his cause with young MUSICIAN

McCain Performance Series features violinist

By DAVID LAUNDER
Kansas State Collegian

One of the most highly decorated young musicians in the world is coming to K-State this weekend.

TICKET INFO

Tickets are $12 for the general public, $10 for seniors, citizens and $6 for students and children. Tickets can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

Violinist Stefan Milenkovich will be performing 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium as part of this year's McCain Performance Series.

Milenkovich, who has been playing the violin since he was 3, will play pieces from such prominent composers as Johannes Brahms, Niccolò Paganini and Maurice Ravel.

"He is an amazing performer," said Thom Jackson, marketing and development officer for McCain. "To see this young talent play the violin will really be something special."

For his performance, Milenkovich will be using a Stradivarius violin. One of the most expensive violins in the world, Jackson said the Stradivarius is played by only the top musicians.

Born in the former Yugoslavia in Belgrade, Milenkovich is 23, and Jackson said he is a well-traveled musician.

Performing since age 7, he has played to many audiences around the world. Some of the more prominent ones include former President Reagan at age 10, Mikhail Gorbachev at age 11 and Pope John Paul II at age 14.

Throughout his career, he has played throughout Europe, Asia, Australia and North America, including his 1,000th concert in Monterey, Mexico.

Milenkovich also has received several awards during his career.

In 1994, he became the youngest person ever to win a medal at the Indianapolis International Violin Competition, taking home the silver.

In 1997, he won the Young Concert Artists International Auditions, which helped springboard his New York debut recital.

The Young Concert Artists Series also presented his Washington, D.C., debut and his New York concerto debut with the New York Chamber Symphony.

"I'm really excited to see him coming to Manhattan," Marshall Meek, junior in public relations, said. "I've seen him play before. He is awesome."

Prior to the performance by Milenkovich, a lecture will be given by Cora Cooper, associate professor of music. In her speech, she will describe and explain what Milenkovich will be playing.

Also before the concert on Friday, Milenkovich will be visiting four area schools, giving a small version of his concert.

"He is a really neat kind of guy," Jackson said. "This will be a really fun thing for kids to see."

McCain usher Francis Russell said the performance shouldn't be missed.

"This is such a wonderful opportunity to see and hear a talented musician," Russell said. "It's a good chance for young people to enjoy a fine production."

Manhattan indoor ice rink prepares for new season

By ALLISON RUSHTON
Kansas State Collegian

When deciding where to go for a winter workout, Manhattan residents should keep in mind that the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex isn't the only place in town to have some fun and work up a sweat.

As of Dec. 1, the indoor ice rink at City Park will be open for business.

Mike Buchanan, recreation supervisor of Manhattan Parks and Recreation, said that every November the park clears out the picnic tables and transforms its Park Pavilion into an ice skating rink.

"It's not the largest rink," Buchanan said. "It's 40-by-60 feet, roughly half the size of a basketball court. It's quaint, though."

Monica Jury, senior in interior design, has worked at the ice rink for six years. She said that, despite its size, it still draws a crowd.

"On our busiest days, Saturday and Sunday afternoons, we'll have as many as 50 people out there at once," Jury said.

Laresa Hernandez, senior in graphic design, said that when she babysits she sometimes will take the children there.

"It's a great way to spend the afternoon," Hernandez said. "The kids love it."

Jury said most of the regular skaters are younger children from the community, but often in the evening, college students come to skate.

Buchanan also said that once the season gets under way, many campus organizations rent the rink for private parties at an hourly fee.

Admission to the rink is $1.50 per person, and the rental fee for skates also is $1.50. Season passes are available as well.

In addition to open skating, Jury said the ice rink offers open hockey Wednesday evenings.

"It's not organized hockey, just pick-up games," she said. "But it's open to anyone who wants to play."

Buchanan said indoor skating in Manhattan began in 1983 when the city purchased a portable ice rink. Previously, the southern end of City Park was flooded yearly in hopes the standing water would freeze into a skating pond.

While the indoor ice rink is somewhat dependent on the weather, Buchanan said it can operate properly in temperatures as high as 50 degrees.

Also, because of its size, Jury said it isn't difficult to maintain.

"It takes us about 30 minutes to clean up the rink at the end of the day," Jury said. "All we have to do is shovel out the excess snow and ice, and then refill the rink with water from a regular garden hose. Sorry, no Zamboni."

Once open, the ice rink will operate until March 4. For more information, contact Manhattan Parks and Recreation at 587-2757.

MISSOURI

Mizzou's losing record is quite misleading.

"Even though they've won only three ball games, in some of those losses they could have won, and they played well enough to win those ball games," he said.

"Michigan State comes to mind. Nebraska comes to mind."

"Then going back two years, the last time we were there, and how fortunate we were to come away with the victory, I think all of those things, regardless of what the status of the Northern Division Championship happened to be, would still be motivating factors to make us realize you better have yourself well prepared or your going to be in serious trouble."

The Tigers' Sept. 30 performance against Nebraska, a 42-24 loss in Lincoln especially stands out to Hudson.

"If you look at them on film, although they've slipped up a few times, they're very capable of beating any team," he said. "They were right in the hunt against Nebraska up at Nebraska and they were right there, and they didn't get it done because of an interception. So they're definitely somebody to be reckoned with."

Nevertheless, whether the Tigers are a viable concern or not, Snyder said Mizzou will be riding an emotional high after its 47-22 win last weekend at Baylor.

"It was very beneficial for the University of Missouri to win and win as handily as they did," Snyder said. "I think it was a real motivational ball game for them, coming off the successive losses that they had prior to that ball game."

"I think they felt it was a needed win, I think they appreciated it a great deal and I think it was a motivation for their football team to prepare well during this week — that coupled with the motivation of last year's loss, which they certainly can use as motivation."

That loss in '99 was a 66-0 shellacking to K-State in Manhattan. However, the Wildcats aren't looking at the past in preparing for Missouri.

"I think that's a great accomplishment for our team if we go forth with it, and I think it's definitely a second chance that we'll have to take advantage of," said senior defensive end Monty Beisel.

his speed. He's fast, and he's tall, and those corners nowadays in that league are big, strong kids."

Those professional cornerbacks might be the only people that can guard Morgan since none at the collegiate level can, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said.

Even if K-State's secondary were to defend Morgan in a game, the receiver's abilities still would demand a respectful distance between him and the defensive backs.

"I'm not sure we would press him," Bennett said. "We would probably play short, deep play if we could find a way."

As a result, the Cats are glad they are playing with Morgan instead of against him, Cartwright said.

"Quincy's a tremendous athlete. I think he's in the top five receivers in the nation right now," he said. "He's great, so I can't ask to be on a team with a better guy than him. I'd hate to be playing against him."

his little tirade on Tuesday. He accused the media of trying to bury him and the MU program.

"You have no idea what it takes to coach a football team," Smith said. "But still, you try to write about it. And it's strictly opinion. Who cares about your opinion?"

OK, Smith is gone. He has no chance of coming back next season. The media doesn't want him. The fans don't want him, as was evidenced by those who left during the first quarter of MU's loss to Colorado two weeks ago.

But the Tigers still have all the motivation they need to get up early Saturday and play their hearts out. This is Mizzou's big chance to go out and shock the world. But will they? Probably not, but you never know.

Tony is the sports editor for the MU Student News at Missouri University. You can e-mail him at musnsports@excite.com.

BOSS

Nevertheless, there are distinctions between '98 and the present. This year, the Wildcats are heading into Columbia with something different under their belt — two losses.

That said, maybe the victory over Nebraska last weekend won't have the same effect it did on the Cats of old. Besides, two years ago, K-State traveled to Mizzou with the Big 12 Championship invitation already in their grasp, which might have contributed to the lackadaisical performance.

Conversely, the Cats of 2000 have destiny in their own hands. They determine their own fate. A win over the Tigers is what the team needs to meet their goal of competing for a conference title.

Those two losses to Oklahoma and Texas A&M are meaningless right now. Just ask tailback Josh Scobey.

"It doesn't matter about the wins and losses. It matters where you end up at the end of the season," he said.

And where the Cats end up depends largely on this weekend.

Sounds like sufficient motivation to me.

Derek is a K-State sophomore in print and electronic journalism. You can e-mail him at dnb8765@ksu.edu.

drawn to the stage when the music to "Ready to Run" began playing. Hits such as "There's Your Trouble" and "Hello, Mr. Heartache" followed. The two hours of Dixie Chicks music was broken up with jokes, including cracks against President Clinton and the current presidential candidates.

"We took a trip to the Oval Office, and got to meet the president," Martie Seidel, fiddle and mandolin, said. "Emily said on the way out he was checking out my backside."

Some of the show's special effects included fake snow falling during the performance of "Cold Day in July" and the disbursement of the entertainers around the coliseum during "Goodbye Earl." Natalie Maines, lead vocals, said "Goodbye Earl" has given the trio a reputation.

"It seems like in the last year we've gotten the reputation of being the bad girls of country music," Maines said.

The concert closed with the playing of the group's title track from its 1998 album, "Wide Open Spaces."

"We think this is the song that got this whole crazy mess started," Maines said after thanking the Lesley Johnson, freshman in kinesiology, took her roommate, Erin Hickey, freshman in elementary education, to the concert after getting free admission.

"My dad knows a guy who travels with the Dixie Chicks, so we got tickets through him," Johnson said.

Johnson said the concert was entertaining, and even though she got free tickets, would have been worth the $45.50 charge. She said the Dixie Chicks have grown popular with all ages because of their personalities.

"Probably just because they're three strong women who stand up for their views," Johnson said. "Everyone looks up to them as role models."

Megan Kersley, junior in biology, was another member of the Kappa group, and said she was very impressed with the performance.

"It's the best concert I've ever been to," she said. "It was so worth the money, and I was with all my friends. It just rocked."

president, but nothing had been established as an ultimate decision."

Dill e-mailed a letter Nov. 10 to most of the 485 students, as well as faculty and staff, apologizing for how the announcement was made.

Dill said some athletes would transfer to other colleges. Junior soccer player Antonio Sapcutt is one who is leaving.

"It's a real bum deal," said the junior from Lawton, Okla. "I came here just to play and go to school. Nobody expected it to happen."

With the cuts, McPherson will become the last of the 10-member Kansas Collegiate Athletic Conference to offer athletic scholarships. The college still offers enough sports to maintain KCAC membership and comply with federal gender equity requirements.

Dropping the three sports will save the college $50,000, which can be used for scholarships. Dill said an experimental program offered scholarships to freshmen in basketball and volleyball.

"We will begin offering athletic scholarships for every program we offer" in the fall of 2001, Dill said. "That means we'll have to narrow the scope."

The Collegian staff would like to thank JoAnne Breault and the members of ADPI house for preparing the food featured on Thursday's Food & Drink page.

Wamego LSD lab discovered

■ World's largest known acid lab found in former missile complex still under investigation by DEA.

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Federal agents began dismantling the world's largest known LSD lab Saturday in Wamego.

The lab, which could have produced one-third of the world's supply of LSD, was discovered before becoming fully operational, said Shirley Armstead, public information officer with the Drug Enforcement Administration.

"We don't know for sure how much LSD could have been manufactured there," she said. "Right now we're estimating between 36 and 60 million dosage units of LSD."

"It was a non-operational lab. The chemicals were on-site, but the making of LSD had not started."

No dollar amount has been assigned to the lab's worth yet, Armstead said. While the DEA does not do this, fiscal estimates are often given later.

WHAT IS LSD?

— LSD (lysergic acid diethylamide), or acid, is a semi-synthetic hallucinogen.
— A microgram, or 1/1000 of a milligram, is enough of a dose to significantly alter mental perceptions, causing hallucinations.
— LSD is a white, odorless crystalline powder that is water soluble.
— Many users can experience unpleasant reactions to the drug, or bad trips.
— No deaths resulting exclusively from LSD overdoses have been documented, but prolonged use can cause depression and anxiety. LSD deaths do, however, occur from suicides while under the influence, or from accidental deaths or mutilations.

Source: Addiction Research Foundation

The lab, formerly the site of a missile complex, was first discovered Nov. 7 after two San Francisco men, William Leonard Pickard, 55, and Clyde Apperson, 45, were apprehended after being pulled over the night before.

Apperson was immediately taken into custody, but Pickard fled on foot, Pottawatomie County Sgt.

Paul Schliffke said. Local law-enforcement officers were called in for back-up.

After an 18-hour manhunt, a local farmer called the police and said he saw someone matching Pickard's description on his property, Schliffke said.

Pickard and Apperson were indicted by a federal grand jury and have been charged with conspiracy to manufacture, distribute and dispense LSD.

No other arrests have been made at this time in connection to the lab.

Since then, local and federal agents have been on-site securing the premises and controlling access into the building, Schliffke said.

The DEA's duties will continue for the next several days, Armstead said. They are obtaining samples from the lab.

Within the next couple of weeks, a hazardous waste team will come in to clean up, followed by the release of further details, Armstead said.

"Once everything is done and over with, we'll have a press conference and release more information," she said.

MU football coach fired after defeat

By DAVID SCOTT
The Associated Press

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Larry Smith, who followed two bowl seasons with two losing seasons, was fired Sunday after seven years as the Tigers' football coach.

He was dismissed by athletic director Mike Alden one day after a 28-24 home loss to K-State, ending a 3-8 season. The defeat was the latest embarrassing setback for Missouri, which this year lost to Clemson (62-9), Texas (47-12) and Kansas (38-17).

Smith, who had three years to go on his contract, had a 33-46-1 record at Missouri. His career record is 143-126-7 in 24 seasons, with previous stops at Tulane, Arizona and Southern California.

Missouri lost all five games it played this year against top-25 teams. It beat Oklahoma State and Baylor — the Big 12's worst teams — and Division I-AA Western Illinois. Smith was 1-27 against top 25 teams while at Missouri.

Following Saturday's loss, Smith said he had no plans to resign. He talked optimistically, saying he thought Missouri would have a great team next year and discussing recruiting priorities.

In 1997, after 13 consecutive losing seasons at Missouri, Smith guided the Tigers to a 7-5 record and the Holiday Bowl, and was honored as Big 12 coach of the year by The Associated Press.

The next season, Missouri beat West Virginia in the Insight.com Bowl, finishing the year with an 8-4 record — the Tigers' first bowl win since the 1981 Tangerine Bowl. The consecutive bowl trips were the first for Missouri since 1980-81.

Those wins made Smith one of only four coaches to take four different teams to a bowl.

Shalala addresses K-State

Universal health-care access focus of speech Friday

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Donna Shalala, U.S. Secretary of Health and Human Services, spoke about equal access to health care for all Americans during the Landon Lecture on Friday afternoon.

"We have the finest health-care system in the world, but too many of our citizens enjoy less years in their lives and less health in their lives," she said.

More than 42 million Americans, including 10.5 million rural residents and more than 11 million children, do not have health care.

Access to health care doesn't always mean quality care, she said. Between 50,000 and 100,000 hospital patients die each year because of medical errors, making it the eighth leading cause of death in the country.

Shalala said she supported a patient's bill of rights that would work toward all patients getting the right care at the right time and in the right way.

Shalala has been with the Clinton administration since he took office in 1993. The administration wanted to guarantee health coverage for all Americans with a sweeping universal health-care plan. They failed in the plan.

"Experience has taught us that the best way to achieve universal coverage is to get political agreement — step by step on first the problem and then the solution," Shalala said.

It's not just the politicians in Washington, D.C., who need to be able to work together to solve this problem. Some changes need to be made at the community and individual levels, she said.

Communities need to work together to coordinate services and provide prevention services so fewer people end up relying on expensive emergency room care, she said.

Shalala has supported programs to keep young people from starting smoking and a program called Girl Power!, which teaches girls between

HHS secretary accepts post at University of Miami

By JAIME HERNANDEZ
The Associated Press

CORAL GABLES, Fla. — Health and Human Services Secretary Donna Shalala is going back to school, announcing Saturday that she will be the next president of the University of Miami.

Shalala will assume her new position next June after spending eight years in President Clinton's Cabinet. The longest-serving HHS secretary, she also is the first Cabinet member to announce post-administration plans.

"I welcome the opportunity to get out of government and get back to higher education," said Shalala, who was chancellor of the University of Wisconsin before she joined the Clinton administration.

She will succeed Edward T. "Ted" Foote II, who is retiring after 19 years.

Clinton sent congratulations from Vietnam, where he was wrapping up a three-day trip.

"She is a talented manager and an energetic leader who will bring great experience to the task of leading the university, its students, its faculty and its alumni," the president said in a statement. "I have no doubt she will be a real asset to the university and its community."

Shalala, a native of Cleveland, was president of Hunter College in New York before going to Wisconsin in 1987.

Miami search committee member Charles Cobb, ambassador to Iceland under former President George Bush, said he first contacted Shalala about the job about 45 days ago.

Negotiations ended Friday, but details of the contract were not released.

"I now understand why the University of Miami is so good at football," she said. "They know how to recruit."

Big 12 tickets still available

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Student-only tickets still remain for the Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship game Dec. 2 in Kansas City, Mo.

The 1,000 allocated student tickets went on sale at noon Sunday, but Sports Information Director Doug Dull said the tickets did not sell out.

However, Dull was uncertain of the number of tickets remaining.

Ticket sales resume today from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. at the Bramlage Coliseum Ticket Office.

As a reminder:

- Purchasers must be student football season-ticket holders.
- Tickets must be purchased in person at the Bramlage Coliseum Ticket Office. Students may not give someone else their ID to purchase tickets for friends.
- One ticket per student can be purchased with valid K-State student ID, and ID cards will be swiped for validation.
- Tickets are $55 and can be purchased by cash or check only.
- Holders of current spouse football season tickets may purchase one ticket only.

International students celebrate holiday with travel, break from class

By ALYSON RALETZ
Kansas State Collegian

Several international students are spending Thanksgiving anywhere but Manhattan.

Karina Martinez Gonzalez, junior in agronomy, is from Monterrey, Mexico, and is an exchange student at K-State who plans on spending her Thanksgiving break in Boulder and Denver, Colo., to visit friends.

"I am using this opportunity to get to know another part of the United States," she said. "If I could not go to Colorado, I would have at least gone to Kansas City, but I would not have stayed in Manhattan."

Many exchange students will not try to prepare their own Thanksgiving dinner, she said.

"Most are planning to go to a restaurant for the dinner," she said. "They want to see what happens on this holiday. They want to experience the traditions."

Veronique Moutarde, junior in German and international business and an exchange student from Clermont-Ferrand, France, also is planning to travel this week.

She said she is going to go to Dallas with other international students. She said she will be visiting the sister of one of her friends.

Texas A&M remembers students lost in bonfire

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — More than 25,000 people weathered driving in rain Saturday to observe the one-year anniversary of the collapse of a log bonfire that killed 12 Texas A&M students.

"It was a healthy night for our university," student Ricky Wood said. "For some, it brought closure."

Students and others huddled under umbrellas on the muddy campus polo fields for a memorial ceremony at 2:42 a.m. — the exact place and time A&M's 59-foot-high log stack collapsed Nov. 18, 1999.

The log stack, weighing more than two jumbo jets, toppled while it was being assembled for the school's annual pep rally on the eve of its football game against archrival Texas. In addition to those killed, 27 were injured.

Family members of each student who died in the accident sat together under umbrellas in rows of seats in a 150-foot circle. Behind each set of seats stood a 5- to 6-foot wood pillar bearing each victim's name and the year they were to graduate.

At the start of the 40-minute ceremony, lights on the fields were turned off and a memorial flame atop a platform in the circle's center was lit. A cannon then was fired 12 times.

The flame stayed lit until 8 p.m. Sunday, to correspond with the time the last victim died.

Saturday afternoon, College Station officials dedicated a plaque and 12 antique-style lampposts inscribed with the names of the victims at a city park near the university. The ceremony was moved indoors because of continuing rain.

"It was an opportunity for the community to share its grief,"

A&M President Ray Bowen said.

Bowen announced in June that the traditional bonfire would continue, but not until at least 2002 and only with greater school supervision and a professionally engineered design.

In May, a five-member commission appointed and funded by the university blamed the collapse on flawed construction techniques and the lack of adequate supervision of students assembling the stack.

Japanese president will resign within 48 hours

LIMA, Peru — President Alberto Fujimori, whose 10-year authoritarian rule has crumbled in recent months over corruption scandals, said in Tokyo early Monday he would resign within 48 hours.

Second Vice President Ricardo Marquez said Fujimori, who has been in his ancestral homeland Japan since Friday, had asked him to step in as president until special elections take place in April.

Prime Minister Federico Salas said the president would give his reasons for stepping down when he presents his resignation to Congress on Monday or Tuesday.

In Washington, D.C., White House spokeswoman Mary Ellen Countryman said the United States would work with the Organization of American States to ensure a smooth transition.

Fujimori's announcement came amid a growing corruption scandal around the president's fugitive ex-intelligence chief, Vladimiro Montesinos. The scandal forced the 62-year-old Fujimori to announce in September that he would step down in July after new elections — ending a decade of iron-fisted rule.

tion, First Vice President Francisco Tudela would assume the presidency. But Tudela presented his resignation hours after Montesinos returned to Peru on Oct. 23 after a failed asylum bid in Panama. Tudela complained that Fujimori was not in control of Montesinos and his allies.

Marquez, the second vice president, had said he, too, would resign if Congress — which last week came under opposition control for the first time since 1992 — took measures to remove Fujimori. But he said Sunday that Fujimori asked him not to quit.

Athletes compete in Special Olympics

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

By NICK BRATKOVIC
Kansas State Collegian

The high fives were often, the smiles were wide and the ball was a little bit lighter than normal, but all in all, the Rangers, a Special Olympics volleyball team from Johnson County, was having fun.

The players were clad in yellow shirts with black lettering as they prepared for a morning match Friday.

For Arnob Mukharji, an 18-year-old member of the Rangers, the tournament was worth the trip.

"We are doing well," he said. "I am playing the position where they serve. I enjoy it all right."

As the game neared, Mukharji and the other players took the court while a crowd of onlookers chanted, "Go Rangers."

The individual players were part of more than 400 Special Olympic athletes who traveled to Manhattan for the bowling and volleyball state competitions. It is a process that takes a while to plan, said Tim Rehder, vice president of sports competition for the Special Olympics of Kansas.

"In years past, we had regional competitions in Lawrence and Salina, but this year we tried to hold the competition in Manhattan," he said.

Rehder said he and his staff worked to coordinate competitions throughout the year. The sports go with the season and include basketball, track and field and a variety of others.

"It is rewarding to see how happy these athletes are to be out and involved," he said.

On the day when the volleyballs bounced and the overhead volleys continued, the Rangers took the court and led early in game one.

One interested observer was Stephanie Hunter, a high school senior from Kansas City, who was volunteering with the team. Her brother, David, is an autistic Special Olympian.

"It is a good opportunity for him to participate in sports," she said. "He has the opportunity to come out with his friends and play and compete. It is not really about winning or losing."

It was easier for her little brother after the team lost its game.

"I honestly believe that we put forth our best effort," David Hunter said.

After the game, the players huddled around their coach and prepared to eat a lunch of sandwiches and other items.

Judy Bates, parent of a Wichita Special Olympian, has made her share of sandwiches over the years. Bates said the organization plays an intricate role in her son's life. Her son, Andy Davis, bowled in the tournament and is a veteran of the games.

"My son has been involved with the Special Olympics since he was 8 years old," Bates said. "He is 23 this month, and it's been a great experience for him."

While Bates said it is supposed to be fun, she said she still takes great pride in Andy's performance.

"I get more excited watching him than I do watching a high school or even college competition," Bates said. "They put so much time and energy into it."

Presidential election faces Supreme Court legal battle

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

George W. Bush and Al Gore marshaled their legal forces Sunday for a climactic state Supreme Court showdown, with GOP lawyers saying it would be unjust to keep the state and the nation on hold during interminable recounts.

With the long-count presidential election stretching into a third agonizing week, the court strategy of both camps reached critical mass: Republicans hope to stop manual recounts that threaten Bush's 930-vote lead out of 6 million cast in make-or-break Florida; Democratic Gore wants the work to grind away, under rules most favorable to him, though his aides fretted Sunday over how little progress they've made in the slow-moving recounts.

Bush's lawyers argued in court papers that Republican Secretary of State Katherine Harris has the authority to certify election results without accepting hand counts. They also said allowing the recounts to continue in scattered Democratic-leaning counties would violate the constitutional rights of voters elsewhere.

"The selective manual recounts authorize county boards to engage in arbitrary and unequal counting of votes, and result in the disparate treatment of Florida voters based solely on where within the state they happen to reside," Bush argued.

In a separate brief, Harris tried to distance herself from both Bush and Gore, even as Democrats pointed to her GOP presidential campaigning as a sign of bias. All seven Supreme Court justices were appointed by Democratic governors.

The Gore team asked the court to set a generous standard for officials to ascertain the electorate's will when ballots were punched in the disputed presidential election. They said local election officials in close cases can determine the voter's intent by closely examining the ballot.

Twelve days after America voted, the weekend tally of overseas absentee ballots lengthened Bush's tiny 300-vote lead to a still-minuscule 930.

With recounts under way in two Democratic-leaning counties and a third set to begin, Gore had a net gain of 78 votes which, if allowed, would cut Bush's lead to 852. On Sunday, both sides objected to county vote-counting procedures.

Gore narrowly won the national popular vote and has a slight edge over Bush in the Electoral College tally, though neither man can reach the required total of 270 electoral votes without Florida's 25.

The identity of America's 43rd president rests with the courts and in the ballot-counting rooms of Palm Beach, Broward and Miami-Dade counties, where more than 1.5 million ballots were cast, a majority being Democratic.

Bush's camp continued its assault on the Gore-backed recounts, depicting the process as riddled with human error and Democratic bias.

Gore's advisers were frustrated Sunday by small recount gains, particularly in Palm Beach County, where the election tempest first began when Democratic voters complained of a confusing ballot.

The vice president's team accused the local elections board of imposing a too-strict standard for approving ballots.

In one Palm Beach precinct, Democrats said Gore picked up 11 votes in a sample recount conducted more than a week ago. When the same precinct was counted Saturday, Gore had lost 10 votes from the first tally. The board actually had counted 202 precincts, but only released totals where there were no disputed ballots.

Coming TOGETHER

Country should work together to find solutions to atrocities of the past centuries-old wounds that have festered in the United States among descendants of African slaves.

In an interview with Paul Shepherd of The Associated Press, Charles J. Ogletree, a member of the Reparations Assessment Group, said,

"We will be seeking more than monetary compensation. We want a change in America. We want full recognition and a remedy of how slavery stigmatized, raped, murdered and exploited millions of Africans through no fault of their own."

Federal and state governments, as well as private companies and institutions, will be the target of this lawsuit that could cost America billions of dollars.

Money cannot buy you love or happiness, but according to Johnny Cochran and a group of lawyers calling themselves the Reparations Assessment Group, it can cure

Now, I am the first to admit that slavery is wrong. So wrong that there aren't words to describe how wrong it truly is. I also realize that further injustices and atrocities have happened to blacks since slavery was abolished in 1865.

Seeking damages won't bring back Emmitt Till or James Byrd or countless others who were lost in the ugly throes of racism. It won't change what happened before 1865 or after. It won't mend wounds.

Seeking money isn't going to change minds — it only will add fuel to the fire of racists who look for any reason that they can find to hate.

It seems that on this issue our country takes one step forward and two steps back. Slavery shouldn't be just a black tragedy — it should be looked at as an American tragedy. It is an ugly piece of our history, but we can use this piece of history to change the future. We can learn from our mistakes and move forward, like we should have been doing all along.

We, as Americans, as the lawyers of the Reparations Assessment Group assert, still suffer slavery's effects. We need to work together to find a solution that won't further rip our country apart. Our country, in theory, should be more about "we" the people and less about them or us, black or white.

We are all Americans. We should lift each other up, and this lawsuit only stands to further tear us apart and distance us from one another. It isn't right to ask people to pay for something they didn't have a role in.

I had no control over what others did in the last century. I wish I could change what happened, but I cannot. I only can assure you that I abhor the behavior of these rotten dead white people. I abhor the behavior of some white people today. I can assure you that their legacy of racism has ended with me. I can assure you that I never will go back. I always will do my best to fight racism around me. That is all any of us can do.

We need to hear what the Reparations

Assessment Group has to say because they carry an important message. They possess knowledge about a part of history many of us have yet to hear because we are not educated in black history in schools across this country. We need to demand a change. We need to stand together.

Asking for money, for reparations, is like buying, paying for and enslaving African-Americans all over again. We need to break the chains. Don't enslave a new generation.

Parents should become more responsible for children's education

Parents, not schools, are the source of our national educational woes.

There seems to be two schools of thought on education — either you don't believe the schools are good enough and never will be, or you believe that if you throw money at the problem, it will fix itself.

Both sound like nonsense to me. Every day you can read some article about how Al Gore or George W. Bush plan to improve schools. It's something that sounds really good and should go into the book of quotations for aspiring politicians. I won't argue with it. Public schools need all the help they can get these days. Purchasing up-to-date textbooks and other related learning tools can be expensive. How much did it cost for your textbooks this semester? In addition, teachers need to be paid more, not for their required eight-hour school days, but for the countless hours of preparing, assessing and grading.

The interesting thing is that our problem isn't that the schools are doing a bad job. To begin with, I would like to challenge anyone who actually believes that Colleges of Education are churning out teachers who are less qualified than those who came before. I even can say that children possibly could learn from the same textbooks I used.

Let me step out on another limb and say that even on the current school budgets, our public school teachers, their methods and their equipment are better than when I was in school. The problem lies in the fact that schools are spending too much time compensating for what the children don't get at home, which leaves less time for the education itself.

Misconceptions abound about our public schools. A recent letter to the editor stated that because of lack of funds, "non-essential" programs must be dropped. This just isn't true. The fact of the matter is that art, gym, music, even science and social studies are losing time to the "Three R's," "R"eading, "R"iting and "R"ithmetic.

In one nearby district, which will remain nameless, the kids get gym or music once per day, are taught science or social studies every other week if lucky and the teachers have to schedule time weeks in advance for the two art teachers in the district. The "Three R's" command so much time and intensity that there just isn't time to fit in the "non-essentials."

Why? Are children these days less intelligent than they used to be? Don't be ridiculous. Then it must be that teachers are bordering on incompetence. Give me a break. The fact is, many parents are not preparing their children for school.

First of all, there is a certain level of education and socialization the child must attain before entering kindergarten. Secondly, how will they retain this information if the classroom skills are not reinforced and supplemented at home? Schools simply cannot replace an educational home environment no matter how much money they are given.

Here's another headline: "Behavior Problems are Prevalent in our Public Schools." Now really, how can you blame our schools for this?

Special counselors are required in every school in the nearby district specifically to handle behavior problems. This is outrageous. There is no reason schools should put such an inordinate amount of effort into teaching children how to act. They should learn this at home. For those of you who don't understand or can't see the answer, I'll say it bluntly. Teach your kid some manners.

Somewhere along the line, the attitude that adults should be respected got lost. Teach them to listen to instructions and show them that school is important. There always have been problem children in schools, but you would be amazed at the scope of this problem.

To emphasize my point that parents don't spend enough time with their children, I note a newer program in school today that wasn't always there: breakfast in school. Why? It does sound good for the children, and it is, especially for low-income families. It's an important part of getting off to a good start in school. I wonder, though, do these kids who eat breakfast at school have any parents?

Notwithstanding the low-income family argument, why can't they have breakfast at home? For that matter, why does the district have to pay for this program? They have to pay for this because they are expected by parents to teach our kids to a certain standard, and you can't effectively teach a hungry child. But how hard is it to make sure you sit down and eat something with your child before you send them off to school? Can anyone else see the opportunity for parent-child interaction?

Fifteen to 20 minutes over breakfast is an extremely valuable learning environment. Use it to your advantage. How much more can our schools do for us? What's next, feeding them dinner and putting them in bed?

Another recent quote: "The only way to make public education better is to spend money on our public schools." I agree, but don't be misled. As good as our public schools are, they cannot effectively negate bad parenting.

The real question facing the nation is how do we improve the parenting skills of our adults? This doesn't leave people without children unaccountable. We all are at fault, but it begins with the parents. There is no greater issue facing our schools and our society today than the plain and simple fact that inadequate parenting is the direct cause of problematic, uneducated children.

This affects the children around them, the teachers who have to focus more attention than they should on a small percentage of their class and the districts who must meet goals attainable only by attentive children. Simply said, schools do the best they can with what we give them. There are so many good children in our public schools, but who is sitting next to them?

Look to yourselves. Devote more time to your kids. Make them breakfast. Read them books. Help them with their homework. Teach them how to act in society. Be there at dinner. The first zone of education is the home, then society and only then should schools be made accountable.

I will find a good school for my daughter. Whether it's public or private doesn't matter. I can say that I will have done my research. The most important thing on my checklist is to find a school that requires my participation in events and homework. That is the only way that I can guarantee that my child will be seated next to children with parents who think like I do. I might not be the perfect dad, but I am going to give her my best effort, every day of my life. That, I believe, is what a good parent does. If you do not want to focus your life on your kids, simply don't have any.

Life is not about money or power. It's about the children.

Collegian editorial board thankful for many things

Thanksgiving is a time to reflect on our blessings. Here is a list of things members of the Collegian editorial board are thankful for this year.

— a 29-28 win against Nebraska, giving K-State another chance at the Big 12 title

— students voting "no" on a $6.50 per student per semester privilege fee hike for the proposed student activities center

— three days off from classes

— an entire day of meals not provided by the K-State Student Union

— a new men's basketball coach proud of the campus he coaches for and not a petulant, whining mope

— the San Diego Chargers' presence in the AFC West makes the Chiefs' schedule that much easier

— fuzzy kittens

— for some, graduation is right around the corner

— for several days, parking spaces will be much easier to find — apparently Thanksgiving now marks the midway point in Christmas shopping season, so we're halfway through — odds of classes being cancelled on account of snow increase from "nonexistent" to "miniscule"

— much harder for instructors to fax pop quizzes home during vacation

— home = laundry

— an end to all the election hubbub and nonsense (no, wait ...)

— painkillers

— warm blueberry muffins and hot homemade cocoa, hot apple cider that will drive your friends loco, gravy and stuffing and fresh turkey wings, these are a few of our favorite things.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Some people pay a lot more than $50 to spend the weekend at Riley County Jail.

You know, if you all just would have voted for Nader, none of this would have happened.

I think next year, before students can buy season football tickets, they should be required to pass a multiple choice football test, because we have some really ignorant fans.

Are there any other receivers besides Quincy Morgan?

K-State needs to pick their game up on the road or we are going to get spanked by Oklahoma.

If we win the Big 12, are we going to take the goalpost to Chance in Kansas City or Chance in Manhattan?

Towel guy, you are my hero.

Why does my economic teacher resemble the Wizard of Oz?

Ah, I forgot to take the condom off my banana when I took a bite out of it.

Okay, let me get this straight. I am paying a bazillion dollars to this school so I cannot have any place to park, not being able to enroll for class, and now I have roaches in my dorm. Crap.

I just get a real kick out of the fact that all of the people sending in their strong pro-life opinion to the Collegian are men. Isn't that just hilarious?

The Chiefs are terrible. When is anyone going to realize that? When is everyone going to realize that? They suck.

Jeff Elliott, you must be a woman, because you sure like to speak for all of them.

Arrowhead Stadium holds 80,000 and 1,000 students can go to the game. Freaking wrong.

Campus group auctions off souls for good cause

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Individuals for Freethought will sell their souls to the highest bidder at 7 tonight in Union Forum Hall to raise money for the Flint Hills Breadbasket and their group.

"We wanted to find a way to do a charitable and a fund-raising event and this one seemed to work," said John Franson, IF historian and senior in print journalism. "We are going to split whatever money we make, 50-50."

The Soul Auction will be structured like a normal auction, but volunteers will sell their souls and earn them back by donating time to the buyer, said Paul Youk, IF president and sophomore in sociology.

"We have contracts that the sellers have filled out, pledging to donate a certain amount of hours and activities to the buyer," Youk said. "We use the number of hours times the number of activities to determine an opening bid, which will probably range between $2 and $6."

Activities might include washing the buyer's car, cleaning the buyer's apartment, preparing meals, attending church, Bible study or an organizational meeting with the buyer, going on a date with the buyer or a buyer's friend, or other activities specified by the seller.

Keiv Spare, IF member and senior in civil engineering, volunteered to sell his soul at the auction tonight.

"I checked off basically everything but washing a car simply because it is too cold," Spare said. "I think it is for a good cause, so I donated several hours. Plus, I want to make my soul as valuable as possible."

Franson said he pledged four hours to the highest bidder.

"It will be fun, and it is for a good cause," he said. "I am pretty open to doing anything, so I checked all the activities on the contract."

Youk said he hopes the auction will be supported by students because of the win-win situation it presents.

"We hope to get a good turnout because it will be worthwhile for everyone involved. It gives the buyers the opportunity to get someone to do something they are interested in or something they need to have done, and it also lets them give back to the community," he said. "You can donate money to a charity and help out an organization on campus, and then you will get something in return."

However, Youk said he isn't sure how it will go over on campus.

"We have got some e-mail in support of it, but it is difficult to gauge because we don't know if people will be turned off or acceptable to the idea as a good, charitable event," he said.

Franson said he is hoping for a good turnout because the group is offering a service many students might be able to use right now.

"With finals and the holiday season coming up, students probably are a little more stressed out than normal," he said. "This will give students and others a good chance to get some cheap labor and maybe some tutoring that would come in handy right now."

Injury update

■ Junior free safety Jon McGraw missed Saturday's game after suffering an injury Nov. 11 against Nebraska.
■ Offensive tackle Milford Stephenson exited the Missouri game in the second quarter with an unspecified injury and did not return. However, head coach Bill Snyder said the injury was not serious.
■ Offensive tackle Thomas Barnett also left the Missouri contest with an unspecified injury, but was able to return.
■ Left guard Andy Eby on the injuries to the offensive line Saturday.
"A couple guys got banged up a little bit, but Matt Martin and Nick Leckey came in and played well, and John Robertson moved out to tackle and played well, and did what we had to do."

Flag day

K-State was penalized 13 times for 94 yards against the Tigers, a stat that doesn't please head coach Bill Snyder.
"We probably did set a world record today in terms of penalties, and that's a big concern that I have because that's a lack of discipline on our part, and those were, for the most part, lack of discipline penalties that were created.
"You have to, as a head football coach, make sure your players have the kind of discipline, the self-discipline that is necessary in order to compete in this or any other game, and we didn't have that today."

Block party

The Wildcat special teams unit has had a punt blocked in each of its past two games, both occurring on their first offensive possessions.
"It doesn't make me happy, and it makes me feel like we are really doing a very inadequate job of preparation in regards to our punting game," Snyder said.

BIG 12 BOUND

Cats to get 2nd chance at Sooners after Mizzou victory

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State's 28-24 win over Missouri might have clinched the Wildcats a berth in the Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship game, but head coach Bill Snyder knows more than anyone about the long road it took to get there.
"As I told our players, I'm pleased that that's where we are, but I'm not very happy about how we got there," he said.
However, that's not to say such an accomplishment goes without recognition, despite the Cats' struggles against unranked Mizzou, Snyder said.
"I did want them to understand that under any circumstances, they still were the Northern Division Champions, that they still were a 10-2 football team and they still had some of their goals alive."
"I was proud and pleased, but I also shared with them how important it was for all of us to make a very, very strong commitment to improving this football team. First individually and collectively unit by unit, and then as a team, because we did not play nearly as well as we're capable of, and certainly not as well as we have in the past two weeks."
Snyder said he isn't focusing on what his team has accomplished thus far. Rather, he's intent on correcting as many mistakes before the Cats' begin concentrating on their Dec. 2 rematch with No. 1 Oklahoma.
"I don't think that I'll take any time at all to celebrate anything," Snyder said after the MU victory. "I'll really want to find out all the problems that existed today and get focused on trying to correct the problems that we have, because we've got a lot of corrections in front of us."
"What I'm looking forward to right now is getting ourselves back in the meeting room and back on the practice field and becoming a better football team. That's number one. Then at the appropriate time, when we become a better football team, then we'll get focused on the University of Oklahoma."
Defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said he isn't even thinking about the Sooners right now, either.
"I just want to enjoy this one. I want to go home, I want to see

MU game draws similarities to '98

COLUMBIA — Saturday was 1998 all over again. Two years ago, K-State took an emotional 40-30 victory over Nebraska to Memorial Stadium/Faurot Field, only to hold on to a narrow 31-25 victory. Not much was different this weekend. Following the Wildcats' 29-28 come-from-behind win over the Cornhuskers, K-State again took the road to Columbia. This time, the winning margin was less than six, as the Cats triumphed 28-24 in front of 49,277.

In fact, left guard Andy Eby won't deny the similarities between the two seasons.
"It reminds you a lot of the '98 year," he said Saturday. "We were getting ready to play for a big conference championship and we had to come through Missouri and they played us real tough. It's pretty much the same thing that happened two

Fullback provides offensive spark for Wildcats

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State should consider adding a new statistical category for the offense — tackles broken per carry.
If there was such a stat, Rock Cartwright would have easily been at the top of the list for the Cats on Saturday. The junior fullback flattened, dragged and juked would-be tacklers to rumble for 51 yards and one touchdown on just five carries.
The stats are telling — defensive linemen and linebackers cannot tackle Cartwright above the waist.

"They can't tackle me high. I think that's an advantage that I have because my center of gravity is so low," he said. "They're hitting me good. I was taught always to never stop your legs on contact."
As for defensive backs, well, they'd better look out, Cartwright said.
"I don't think there's a defensive back — I'm not going to say there isn't — but there aren't a lot of defensive backs that can try to tackle me in the way that it needs to be done," he said. "My eyes kind of light up."
Of course, when a player is 5-foot, 8-inches tall and weighs 242 pounds, he is expected to charge into the line of scrimmage like a bull through the streets of Pamplona. However, what he isn't expected to do is catch a pass and then weave his way down the field.

Cartwright, though, did just that against Missouri. With less than two minutes left in the first half, he caught a screen pass on the left sideline and ran 39 yards downfield before finally being dragged down at the 9-yard line. K-State would score three plays later to take the lead for good.
Nevertheless, Cartwright isn't just a

Grinch steals Christmas crowds

Carrey's version of classic brings warm feelings of season, gains attention of weekend patrons

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

You're still a mean one, Mr. Grinch.

The live-action version of Dr. Seuss' "How The Grinch Stole Christmas" (also a 1966 animated special) is sure to tickle the funny-bones of young and old alike.

For the three of you out there who don't know the plot, allow me to explain: a cave-dwelling old miser (whose heart is two sizes too small) plans on ruining Christmas for the citizens of the tiny town of Whoville. But, in the process, he learns a tremendous lesson about what Christmas and the holidays are all about.

The stellar cast includes Jim Carrey (in a surprisingly well-done job as the Grinch), Jeffrey Tambor as the mayor of Whoville and Molly Shannon (of "Saturday Night Live") as Betty Lou Who, the mother of little Cindy Lou Who (Taylor Momsen). The entire movie is splendidly narrated by Anthony Hopkins.

The budget for this movie must have been huge; it had to be, if director Ron Howard wanted to recreate the colorful, playful environment that is Whoville.

The town itself is one of the most enjoyable aspects of the film. Everything, from the elaborate costumes to the large, intricate hairdos down to the Whos' little noses, is just as you remember from the book and TV special.

The Grinch is played to sinister perfection by Carrey. The character is given more depth in this version; we're actually given a reason as to why the Grinch hates Christmas.

Through flashbacks, we're able to see the Grinch as an ugly baby, and as an uglier toddler. An interesting addition to the story, but hey, if it has the OK of Dr. Seuss' widow (who was present for the filming of the film and gave it her enthusiastic approval), who are we to argue?

This is another movie that conjures up nostalgia and other warm fuzzy memories of the holiday season. Perhaps that's why almost every show at Seth Childs Cinema was sold out this weekend. But I could be wrong.

"The Grinch" sends us a message of hope, that even the hardest of misers can't resist a bit of holiday cheer. This movie is, for lack of a better word, cute, and stays true to the book and TV special in nearly every respect. It lives up to the original, and definitely will find its place among the classics.

'Bounce' unites talented couple

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

There's just something irresistibly appealing about those two.

In "Bounce," Ben Affleck and Gwyneth Paltrow (both of 1998's "Shakespeare in Love") team up again to play their on-again, off-again romance for all it's worth.

Affleck plays Buddy Amaral who, at the beginning, switches airline tickets with another man who dies when the plane crashes.

A year later, Buddy still feels responsible for the man's death, knowing he should have been on that plane, and as a part of his 12-step program with Alcoholics Anonymous, he sets out to confess this to the man's unknowing widow, Abby Janello (Paltrow).

Instead of explaining that her husband was on the doomed flight instead of himself, Buddy falls for Abby, and he becomes a large part of her life ... until the truth is revealed. Then, of course, Buddy must win her trust and affections again.

"Bounce" includes a powerful supporting cast, including Johnny Galecki ("Roseanne") as Buddy's smartass assistant and Natasha Henstridge ("Species") as the woman who inadvertently reveals Buddy's dark secret.

Written and directed by Don Roos ("The Opposite of Sex"), the plot hasn't been done enough yet to be quite tiresome: man gets into relationship with dead man's wife. It also happened to Harrison Ford and Kristin Scott Thomas in "Random Hearts."

But this movie will appeal to a younger generation, especially those who follow the careers of Affleck and Paltrow religiously. One of the biggest appeals of the movie is Affleck and Paltrow's real-life on-again, off-again friendship/romance.

This relationship doesn't hinder the way their characters are portrayed; rather, it strengthens their performances, making interaction between Buddy and Abby more believable.

Even without their relationship, Affleck and Paltrow are two of the hottest actors in Hollywood today, and they easily could've maintained the movie's greatness without the presence of a real-life romance.

Soundtrack features memorable songs

Review by KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

There's really nothing better than a movie soundtrack.

Some of the most memorable songs ever have come from movie soundtracks.

While the "Bounce" soundtrack might not have any award-winning hits, it does have memorable songs and as a whole, the album is good.

This collection of music, inspired by the recent motion picture starring Ben Affleck and Gwyneth Paltrow, combines familiar artists with some new voices to produce songs that won't be forgotten once the credits end.

The majority of the songs are recorded by females, which isn't too surprising considering "Bounce" is a romance movie.

The predominantly female sound produces an album with a soft but edgy quality that is reminiscent of the "Boys On The Side" soundtrack. One of the soundtrack's surprises comes from Sixpence None The Richer's lead singer Leigh Nash.

Nash breaks away from her band and goes solo with the song "Need To Be Next

To You." Her voice adds a soothing quality with a hint of hurt in one of the album's best romantic songs.

While "Need To Be Next To You," written by Diane Warren, is similar to other Sixpence songs, it proves Nash can make it without the rest of the band.

Other surprises come from relatively unfamiliar artists including Dido, who sings "Here With Me," which has been recently been hitting the airwaves, and Morcheeba, who sings "Rome Wasn't Built In A Day."

If their soft, enchanting voices are any indication to their future, they won't remain unfamiliar for long.

The soundtrack doesn't just rely on unfamiliar artists. Experience in the form of Sophie B. Hawkins and Carly Simon lend their voices to add to the soundtrack.

Even though the album seems to be dominated by women, the album's best track isn't sung by one. "Hush," sung by Angie Aparo (no, I said he wasn't a woman), was a great addition to the album. Aparo's combination folk/rock sound produces an excellent song that should be replayed again and again.

There is no way to go wrong with the "Bounce" soundtrack. Where else can you get a variety of music with all of these artists?

Cross country set to compete in Iowa

■ 7th-ranked women enter NCAA Championships after 3rd straight regional crown.

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

After its third consecutive Midwest Regional Title, the K-State women's cross country team is looking to bring home the national title today as it competes in the NCAA Championships in Ames, Iowa.

Twenty-nine teams and more than 250 competitors will be competing in the event, which will start at 11 a.m. today on the campus of Iowa State University.

After moving up one spot in the FinishLynx/NCAA poll to No. 7 nationally and returning six runners from last year's squad, including three All-Americans, head coach Randy Cole said the K-State women are in great position to compete for the championship.

"They are in peak condition right now," Cole said. "I'm really confident we can go up there and do quite well."

Junior Korene Hinds said she agreed with her coach.

"We are ready to go. This is our last shot," Hinds said. "With our performance in the Big 12 and Regional Championships, I definitely think we have a motivation advantage."

The women's squad placed second in the Big 12 Championships, while taking home the regional title last weekend in Waterloo, Iowa.

The course at Iowa State should be familiar to K-State, too, as it was the same course they raced on for the Pre-NCAA Championships, which was the first event to showcase a 6,000-meter course, an increased distance from the original 5,000-meter layout.

"Getting the opportunity to run the Pre-NCAAs at 6,000 meters was rough at first," Hinds said. "At first you could really feel it, but now we have had the opportunity to adjust to it and now we can run a lot smarter."

Hinds, a native of Jamaica, is looking to make K-State history as a top-30 finish would secure her a third consecutive All-American honor, which no other Wildcat has accomplished.

"I'm concentrated on the team effort right now, but I do have some individual pressure on myself," Hinds said. "Two months ago I didn't even know about this, but now that I do, it's hard not to pressure yourself."

Meanwhile, senior Annie Wetterhus will be competing in her last event as a Wildcat runner. After qualifying individually her freshman year and then competing as a team member the past three seasons, Wetterhus will have traveled to the national championships all four years of her cross country career.

K-State is looking to improve off of its performance last year, which saw them place fifth overall in the national championships, their best finish in team history. Hinds said she believes this year's squad is more than capable of doing just that.

"I know we can do it," Hinds said, "but now all you can do is hope for the best and that everyone just goes out and runs their best. I feel confident we can go out and do it."

my kids without having to rush and get back and forth. If my son's rasslin', I might even rassle a little bit tonight," he said Saturday with a laugh. "He's constantly asking me to rassle him, and I'm always too tired. I'm not going to be too tired tonight. I'm going to pin his little butt."

As for the players, senior defensive end Monty Beisel said he's going to enjoy the Mizzou win, as well as a chance for he and his teammates to get some needed rest before Dec. 2.

"We can celebrate. I'm going to go home and sit on the couch and watch some football, and get ready for two weeks," he said. "We've got Thanksgiving coming up — maybe I'll put on a couple pounds — and get ready for OU."

Nevertheless, just the fact K-State overcame the doubts and played itself back into a rematch with Oklahoma says much about the Wildcat coaching staff, Bennett said.

"I think that's a tribute to Bill Snyder and this program. The thing that amazes me about Coach Snyder is he's so consistent on everything he does. And I think as a coach who's wanting to be a head coach, I've learned so much whether we win by 30, we lose — however."

"Our consistency in this program stays the same. I've been other places where you over react to situations. After the A&M game could have been a prime situation that you could over react to the players, but we did the same thing we did after beating Nebraska this week. It was the same schedule, and I think that's why this program stays where it is."

straight-ahead runner, he said.

"Once I'm in the open field, it's different because I can see things. I can move my feet kind of good," he said. "I just got out there in the flats, and I was open. Beasley hit me on the screen, and the wide receivers got downfield, so it was a big play for the team."

The emphasis on including Cartwright in the offense was a result of his play in practice, offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said.

"We felt good about how Rock has progressed, and we made a concerted effort to get him the ball," he said.

Not everything about Cartwright's performance was positive, though. His blocking, a large duty of the fullback, reflected the play of the entire offense, which gained only 57 yards in the second half.

"As much as we struggled, I'm not sure anybody did any good," Hudson said.

Cartwright said he agreed. "I think I did OK. I didn't do as well as I did in the Nebraska game, but I've got to come back and watch film and see where I've got to correct myself," he said.

Still, despite the blocking problems, Cartwright said he thought he performed well.

"I just tried to step up and make plays. I adjusted my play to make plays, so I think I came through today," he said Saturday. "We came out with a victory — it wasn't too pretty, but it's a victory. So, we've got take it and correct our mistakes and go with it."

years ago."

Yet part of that result can be attributed to things players are unable to control, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"There are subconscious things that take place in the human psyche, and sometimes those are things that maybe we don't have as much control over as we'd like to think that we do," he said.

"And wherever that takes us, I don't know, but I believe that our players were trying desperately not to overlook a football team, not to take a football team for granted, not to take their own personal performance for granted — but it happened."

That doesn't go to say K-State (10-2, 6-2) wasn't excited to face Missouri (3-8, 2-6), Snyder said, in a game that decided the Cats' postseason fate.

"I don't believe and I don't think that our players were any less motivated," he said. "I don't believe that there was that feeling that said, 'This is the University of Missouri, a 3-7 football team.' I believe that they fought against that. I honestly do. I think it goes deeper than that, to be honest with you."

Offensive coordinator Ron

Hudson said he agreed, and said that after the big win over Nebraska, it might have been difficult for some players to not overlook Missouri.

"I think human nature, being a youngster, you probably might have, but that's no reason why we struggled like we did," Hudson said. "They just did a good job. They played hard and they came out and they executed, and it goes to show you that you can lose a game anytime, anywhere and we almost did this weekend."

However, junior linebacker Ben Leber said he'd like to think that none of his teammates looked past Mizzou.

"I hope not. I think for myself and I think for a lot of guys around me, I knew that we were intent on playing this one game, and not looking forward," he said. "I can't account for the rest of the team, but it was a shaky game, and that's the way it may appear, but thank God we got a win."

Still, that near loss to the Tigers cannot be credited to a lack of effort on K-State's part, Snyder said.

"I would question how well we prepared. Our players play with effort, and I believe that we played with effort today," he said Saturday. "I think the University of Missouri played very well. Believe me, they were well prepared — they played hard and deserved a great deal of the credit for creating some of the problems for us that existed today."

Wide-out Aaron Lockett expected that out of Mizzou, though, on the Tigers' Senior Day.

"You talk about the last home game, the seniors' last game, playing a top-10 team — they played for the fans for the coaches. The crowd made it difficult, but we were able to come out on top."

Regardless of the win, Eby wasn't sure whether the Cats' struggles could be attributed to an emotional hangover from the NU win.

"I don't know. For some reason they play us hard at their house, so we had to come in and win the fourth quarter, and I think that was big for us," he said.

And win the fourth quarter K-State did.

After reeling off 25 points in the second period to take a 25-21 lead at the break, and a MU field goal in the third, it came down to the final 15 minutes to decide the game.

Placekicker Jamie Rheem scored the only points in the final frame, a 34-yard field goal to extend the lead to 28-24 with 12:38 to play, and the Cat defense, as well as the officials, then would thwart any hope of a Mizzou comeback.

The Tigers' last possession of the game ended on a Dysnod Carter interception in front of the the ages of 9 and 14 the importance of sports and fitness.

Preventing unhealthy behavior in young people means helping to guide them through adolescence, she said.

"When I came to this department, there were serious grown-up people being paid for with your tax dollars who actually believed that American teen-ager behavior could be changed with a public health brochure," she said. "I never read a teen-ager public health brochure."

She had her department take messages aimed at teens to MTV and soap operas and tried to get the media to accurately portray diseases such as AIDS.

For both young and old, personal behaviors play important parts in health. If everyone would not smoke, eat right and exercise, we would be a much healthier nation and live longer, she said.

Shalala said she thinks many young people, including those in the audience, do not think Medicare and Social Security has anything to do with them.

"No American family could buy a home or send their kids to college if they had to pay the expense of going into the market and finding a health insurance plan for their elderly relatives," Shalala said. "Or, they had to pay the equivalent of a Social Security check every month for their elderly relatives out of their own paychecks."

She said she considers these programs direct subsidies to young people because they allow American families to take care of their young people.

Melanie Wagner, senior in elementary education, said she agreed with Shalala that many young people do not understand the importance of Medicare.

"It depends on how it involves you," she said. "I am hopeful that those who are educated and know have insight and do care."

Education can help improve health and health care, but special interests is an ill that needs to be cured if more meaningful reform is going to be achieved, she said.

Powerful pharmaceutical lobbies have pressed Congress to allow advertising of prescription drugs to the chagrin of doctors who feel pressured to prescribe medication they don't need to patients, she said.

The United States overpays for its drugs as a subsidy to countries around the world.

"I don't think the government purchasing on the behalf of seniors should pay a sticker price," Wagner said. "I believe we should pay a fair price, but I don't think that we should offset some deals they cut in Mexico and Canada, particularly not in the industrialized world."

But the two stars of the bowl teams, quarterback Corby Jones and running back Devin West, graduated after the 1998 season and Smith wasn't able to find adequate replacements.

Missouri stumbled to 4-7 in 1999 after quarterback Kirk Farmer broke his leg in midseason. The Tigers lost six of their last seven, including ugly losses to Oklahoma (37-0), Texas A&M (51-14) and K-State (66-0).

That prompted Smith to scrap the tailback- and option-oriented offense and hire a new offensive coordinator, Bill Cubit, to run a passing attack.

But Farmer broke his collarbone against Nebraska, leaving the offense to redshirt freshman Darius Outlaw.

Last week, Smith noted that numerous improvements were made during his stay — including a new practice facility and upgrades at Faurot Field, as well as a grass field to a new pressbox.

"A lot of people think this program is failing," Smith said. "I don't think it is. I don't think we're doing all that bad."

Several players, including Outlaw and Justin Smith, lobbied after the K-State loss for Smith to remain. Justin Smith said earlier in the week he'd turn pro if Larry Smith were fired, but softened that stance Saturday.

"I've still got to weigh my options, but that would be a major factor," Justin Smith said. "If he left, I'd really have to consider leaving."

with 13,963 students and four campuses.

As HHS secretary, Shalala has overseen health and welfare policy for the government while running a department with 61,000 employees. That includes the Medicare and Medicaid programs, the National Institutes of Health, the Food and Drug Administration and all welfare, and child care programs.

She has implemented sweeping welfare reform legislation that set strict new time limits and work requirements and a new program to provide health insurance to children in working poor families. She also worked to combat fraud in Medicare and extend the long-term solvency of the health insurance program for seniors.

THANKSGIVING

"We are here just for one semester, and we do not want to stay in Kansas," she said. "We want to experience more of the country."

She is looking forward to the meal they will eat at her friend's home, she said.

"His sister will try to make a Thanksgiving dinner at home so we know what Thanksgiving is really about," Moutarde said.

Martinez Gonzalez said the only Mexican holiday that is similar to Thanksgiving is Christmas in Monterrey because they also eat turkey.

"I didn't think the dinner was so important to you," she said. "Christmas is the only holiday with a big family dinner in my country."

Other international students opt not to travel and remain in Manhattan for the holiday.

Most graduate students from other countries are grateful for the time off from their intense course work, said Maria Beebe, program coordinator at the International Student Center.

"They are going to take this time to relax," Beebe said. "Many of them are interested in the holiday, but it's probably just a nice break."

Through her experiences, she said, international students are interested in the different types of cooking, recipes and traditions surrounding the meal.

"There is no cultural equivalent to this truly American holiday," Beebe said. "They want to know its history. What do Americans do on this day? They want to know why we do what we do."

Martinez Gonzalez said she agreed that she was more thankful for the vacation than the holiday's celebration.

"I hope I can eat some turkey, but I basically see it as a break," she said.

Florida secretary of state pronounces Bush winner

By LINDA DEUTSCH
The Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — The Florida secretary of state's declaration Sunday in favor of George W. Bush was certain to trigger intense legal challenges by Al Gore's campaign.

Moments after Katherine Harris declared Bush the winner of Florida's 25 electoral votes, Democratic vice presidential candidate Joseph Lieberman called the results "incomplete and inaccurate" and promised a vigorous challenge.

Former U.S. Secretary of State James Baker, speaking for Bush, attacked the plan for a legal contest and suggested, "At some point ... the lawyers must go home."

But there appeared no chance the competing lawyers would soon head home from Florida.

"I don't believe the people of America want this election turned over to lawyers and court contests," Baker said.

Harris made it clear she did not agree with the Florida Supreme Court decision that forced her to allow recounts beyond a state-mandated deadline, but she said she was complying with it's decision.

Nevertheless, she disallowed partial returns submitted by Palm Beach authorities after she refused to give them a few more hours to count. This removed 180 votes from Vice President Al Gore's total.

She declared Bush the winner by a minuscule 537 votes out of nearly 6 million cast.

Lieberman, in a Washington, D.C. news conference, said Harris' actions deprived a significant number of Palm Beach voters of their "sacred right to vote."

Earlier, Gore lawyer David Boies said he would file suit first thing Monday morning to force the counting of thousands of votes he said were never counted.

"Until these votes are counted, this election cannot be over," Boies told a news conference. "There are thousands of votes that haven't been counted once."

Boies said that contests would be filed in at least three counties — Miami-Dade, Palm Beach and Nassau.

In Nassau County, Democrats are seeking use of the recounted total, which would give Gore 51 more votes.

In Miami-Dade, Boies said there are 10,000 votes which could not be read by a voting machine and were not hand counted.

Boies, asked if legal challenges will ever end, said, "Of course everything's going to be over by Dec. 12," the deadline for certifying Florida electors.

The Rev. Jesse Jackson said Sunday a coalition of civil rights organizations intends to file a lawsuit on behalf of disenfranchised voters in Florida under the Civil Rights act.

In a telephone interview with the Associated Press, Jackson criticized the Justice Department and Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, saying more needs to be done to stop violent protests that intimidate minority voters, and to ensure that no voters are disenfranchised in that state.

Meanwhile, Gore and Bush attorneys

Ag professor earns honor for service

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

A strong commitment to excellent teaching is what Bryan Schurle, professor of agricultural economics and a university distinguished teaching scholar at K-State, has displayed throughout the year.

SCHURLE

Schurle has been selected as the 2000 Kansas Professor of the Year by the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching and the Council for Advancement and Support of Education. It is the eighth time in the past 15 years that a K-State faculty member has been recognized through the competition.

"Each recipient is tremendously outstanding and truly represents the level of excellence attained by teachers at K-State," Provost James Coffman said.

According to the foundation, criteria for the honor include an extraordinary commitment to teaching demonstrated by excellence in the scholarly approach to teaching and learning; contributions to undergraduate education in the institution, community and profession; an effect on and involvement with undergraduate students; and support from colleagues and both current and former students.

"Bryan exceeds the limit in all of these areas, as he proves to be a great example and emphasis on the K-State teaching staff and represents the very best," Coffman said.

Schurle joined the K-State teaching staff in 1977 and was promoted to full professor in 1988, teaching the Department of Agricultural Economics' introductory course, Principles of Agricultural Economics. He also teaches a course in optimization at the graduate level, as well as courses in agricultural economics and computer applications.

"Most importantly, I do whatever it takes to help and encourage students to really learn the material and be able to relate it to real-life situations," Schurle said.

A passion for agricultural economics has inspired Schurle both in the classroom and

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Ritch Galvan, graduate student in theater, points towards a Christmas tree with his son Tyler, 2, as they shop for the right tree Sunday afternoon at Gallaher Tree Farm. It was the first time Tyler has ever picked out a tree.

A TREE TRADITION

Family farm provides alternative work during holidays

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

More than 10 years ago, a tradition was started.

"My dad and I started the tree farm. He had just retired as the head of forestry at K-State, and it was going to be his hobby," said Lindy Gallaher, owner of Gallaher Tree Farms. "It was kind of a family operation."

The Christmas tree farm opened in 1987 when Lindy and his father, Harold, first began selling trees. Two years later his father died, but the tree farm he began remained open.

"It continues on," Gallaher said. It's not only a tree farm anymore. In its 13th year, the farm has become a holiday tradition for many, especially the Gallaher family.

"It's just a fun diversion from what we do with our regular jobs," Gallaher said.

One of the things Gallaher said he liked best about the farm was the response he sees from his smallest customers.

"We enjoy seeing all of the people that come out — especially little kids, seeing their eyes light up with a new tree," he said.

Hot chocolate, candy canes and homemade spiced tea are served to customers, and Beth Gallaher, Lindy's wife, makes and sells wreaths along with K-State student Deidra Lashmet.

"It's not hard, and it's fun to do," Lashmet, senior in horticulture, said. Lashmet has worked at the tree farm since she came to K-State four years ago, and said she has had fun every year.

STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Bryce Barkus, junior in civil engineering, cuts down his Christmas tree at Gallaher Tree Farms on Sunday afternoon. Barkus and his wife, Allison, have made it a tradition of cutting their own tree.

"You get to interact with people, and you get to do crafty stuff, which I like doing," she said.

She said what she liked best about the job was that it wasn't inside.

"I don't like being tied up in a building all day long," she said.

The handmade wreaths are made from trees on the lot. Customers can choose what design they want to have and what they want to have on it.

This is the part of wreath-making Lashmet prefers.

"I like decorating them the best, putting the bows and decorations on them," she said.

When Lindy and Beth are not working on the tree farm, Lindy works at his insurance agency, and Beth works at the Riley County Health Department.

"So, it's quite different from our regular jobs," he said.

Even though the tree farm is not their day jobs, that doesn't mean it's not full-time. New trees are planted each spring and take around five to six years to grow tall enough to sell. In the summer, the trees are shaped and sheered.

"It's kind of a full-time job," he said. "It's not just during Christmas time."

Just like other farmers, the success of Gallaher's farm heavily relies on the weather, and not having rain meant not having as many trees.

"This was a really tough year, this year and last year," he said. "Once they get started, they're fine. It's getting them going that's the hardest part."

He said they don't water their trees, so without the rain, it kind of interferes with the process.

"It's not like you can make them grow any faster," he said. "You can't speed up their growth."

CHRISTMAS TREE TIPS

1. Look at the tree's general appearance.
2. Look at the trunk. It should be straight.
3. Water the tree consistently.
4. Cut off bottom if it's not going to be stood up right away, it helps the tree absorb water.

TREE FARM HOURS

Monday-Friday: 3:30 p.m. until dark
Saturday: 9 a.m. until dark
Sunday: noon until dark
Open until Christmas Eve, and if needing a tree outside of hours, they are available on-call: 539-5676.

The trees, he said, grow about one foot each year. When they are between five to 10 years old, they are usually at their prime to be sold.

Some of the trees aren't cut down until a few years later, though. Those are the trees that are around 15 feet tall — trees you won't find on most lots, he said.

Scotch pine, white pine and Austrian pine are three types of trees grown on the Gallaher farm, but they began importing a different tree a few years ago.

"We bring in Fraser fir trees because we can't grow them in Kansas," Gallaher said. "We bring them in fresh each year. They're the Cadillac of trees, so a lot of people like them."

He said they have softer needles and good straight trunks. The demand from out-of-state people and those in the military was so great it caused them to begin the importing.

No matter what type of tree one chooses, though, it's always better than an artificial one, Gallaher said.

"It's still more fun to have a real tree than an artificial tree," he said. "If nothing else, for the smell."

Weekend car accidents kill 4 on Kansas roads

At least four people have died on Kansas roads during the long holiday weekend.

Darrell Burch, 48, of Augusta, was killed Friday morning when he tried to avoid a deer in the road. His vehicle rolled over on Interstate 70 near Russell, and he was ejected, the Kansas Highway Patrol said.

Also Friday, Vera Reagle, 70, of Fremont, Neb., died when she failed to yield to oncoming traffic turning onto U.S. Highway 77 in Riley County and was struck by another car, the patrol said.

Neal Brechelsen, 45, of Manhattan, died early Friday at a Wichita hospital of injuries he received Thursday morning in Lyon County. The patrol said Brechelsen's car went off U.S. Highway 56, down an embankment and overturned.

Earlier Thursday, Cheryl Dawn Holland, 35, of Caney, died in a two-truck collision. Holland was driving a pickup truck at the intersection of a Montgomery County road and U.S. Highway 169 near Cherryvale when the truck smashed into the side of a tractor-trailer, the patrol said. The truck driver was not injured.

Twelve people died on Kansas roads during the same period last year.

Kansas counties debate possible cell phone tax

TOPEKA — Kansas counties will push once again next year for a monthly 911 tax on cellular phones — for both the counties' good and that of people who count on their wireless phones in emergencies, officials say.

Municipalities use the 911 tax revenue applied monthly to residential and business telephone lines to help support emergency communication systems.

But cell phones, because they are not taxed, don't contribute to those costs.

In addition, county officials say the increased revenue that would be raised by extending the tax to cellular, mobile and wireless phones would allow 911 systems to buy equipment that gives the number of the cell phone user and the caller's emergency location.

Cell phones now account for 30 percent of 911 calls, according to Bill Singer, information technology director for Shawnee County.

Last week, the Kansas Association of Counties voted for the third-straight year to make legislation extending the 911 tax to cell phones one of its priorities.

Kansas law allows local governments to charge residential and business telephone lines up to 75 cents a month to support 911 service, but the law doesn't apply to wireless, cellular and mobile phones.

The money collected through the 911 tax goes toward purchasing equipment, such as radios and phones, for emergency communication centers, Singer said.

Singer said the contention that paying taxes on both fixed and cellular phones would amount to double taxation isn't "a very strong argument."

Asked whether he had given any thought to asking George W. Bush to replace him on the GOP ticket, the 59-year-old Republican vice presidential candidate replied, "No. Not yet."

Cheney called his fourth heart attack in more than 20 years "a reminder of the importance of living a healthy lifestyle and doing all of those things that a prudent man would do, given the fact that I have a long history of coronary artery disease."

Cheney walked out of George Washington University Hospital two days after checking himself in with chest pains. Hospital spokeswoman Lisa Saiselin said that ordinarily "our patients are wheeled to the door."

Doctors put Cheney on the blood thinner Plavix for the next 30 days to reduce the likelihood of problems in the area where they inserted a metal device to widen an artery that had narrowed.

The ordeal began at about 3:30 a.m. Wednesday when he woke up with chest pains and "became increasingly convinced that it might be cardiac related" as the pain continued, Cheney recounted. He woke his wife, Lynne, and they reached the hospital less than an hour after his first sensation of chest discomfort.

"For some like myself, who has a history of coronary artery disease, it's more a matter of a sensation that something's going on that might be cardiac-related," he said.

Tests revealed that an artery had narrowed since his last heart checkup in 1996.

Cheney suffered three heart attacks more than a decade ago and underwent quadruple bypass surgery in 1988 to clear clogged arteries. Doctors gave him a clean bill of health when Bush chose him as his running mate this summer.

Intramural officiating provides cash, fun

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Stress from college alone is enough for some 18- to 22-year-olds. So why in the world would a student who already holds down one job on campus while studying to become a biologist want to add to her stress level by becoming an intramural official?

The answer is simple: because she enjoys it.

"It's a lot of fun," Michelle Laudick, junior in biology, said. "The people I work with are a blast. I have really hard classes, but it's really easy because the two jobs work well together."

Laudick, who also works at the Cats' Den in the K-State Student Union, is one of K-State Recreational Services' veteran officials, with volleyball, flag football, swim meets and cross country to her name. She will add basketball and softball to her list this year.

One of only three female officials on the flag-football field, Laudick said she is much more comfortable now since she knows the rules of the various sports she officiates.

However, the job is not all fun. John Wondra, assistant rec services director, said. Stress, in the form of responsibility on the field, comes with the territory of being an official.

"They have a lot of pressure on them to make quick, snap judgments during sports," he said. "They also have to deal with people they might see the next day in class or across campus who the night before might have been upset with one of their calls."

Upset players, Wondra said, are a result of high expectations intramural teams place on the striped shirts.

"They expect the same level of officiating that they get in high school varsity sports," he said, "but for the most part, we get first- or second-year officials who are just learning the game."

"We've trained people who have had no knowledge of the sport before. It just takes a willingness to get into the rule book and apply the rules to play."

David Debes, freshman in mechanical engineering, is one such official.

Although Debes has never officiated before coming to K-State, he does have experience with sports. Just being a member of a Claflin High School football team that won the state championship three years in a row has helped him to understand the game of football more clearly, he said.

"That helped me some, because I knew what the game was all about," Debes said.

However, when tempers flare on the field or court, Debes said he handles it the way he should, by letting players know who the authority is.

"If it's a controversial call, I call what I see," he said. "It's what I say that goes, and if they don't like it, I can throw them out of the game."

"I don't really enjoy that power, I'm just out there to make sure they have a clean game and hopefully have fun."

Although competitiveness can lead players to complain about officials' judgments, Wondra said his officials are not always perfect, and the willingness to learn from players' criticism is important in making the experience a fun one.

"There is a level where you have to give and take between the official and the team. You've got to be able to listen to their complaints and judge them in an objective way," he said.

"Sometimes they do have legitimate complaints, and it makes you a better official if you learn by what they say."

Debes agreed, and said he knows firsthand the benefits of listening to the players' concerns.

"I thought I made a bad call once, and both teams told me about it, but they were cool with it," he said.

Nevertheless, Debes said, the opportunity to be part of the K-State sports scene is a good enough benefit to be an official.

"You learn a lot about the sport, and you meet some cool people," he said.

Charges expected soon for 2 main suspects of USS Cole bombing

By AHMED AL-HAJ
The Associated Press

ADEN, Yemen — Two main suspects in the bombing of the USS Cole are expected to be charged soon with carrying out the attack, and they could be sentenced to death if convicted, a Yemeni source close to the investigation said Sunday.

Yemeni investigators have concluded the interrogation of the suspects and will turn them over to the prosecution, which will review the case by Tuesday before filing charges, the source said on condition of anonymity.

The suspects have not yet been publicly identified. Prosecutors declined to comment Sunday.

The suspects also will be charged with threatening state security, forming an armed gang and possessing explosives, the source said.

Conviction on all four charges would carry a minimum sentence of 10 years in prison, the source said, adding that the suspects could be executed if convicted of threatening state security or carrying out the bombings.

Most executions in Yemen are by firing squad and are carried out in public to set an example.

The source did not say how many suspects were in custody, but said the prosecution would file all of the charges against at least two of them.

The development comes six weeks after two suicide bombers steered a small boat laden with explosives alongside the Cole and detonated it while the destroyer was refueling, killing 17 U.S. sailors and injuring 39 others.

U.S. and Yemeni officials have said the Oct. 12 attack appeared to be a carefully planned, well-financed operation, and the bomb materials were expertly prepared.

In Yemen, a court generally sets a trial date within a few days of charges being filed. That date usually is within a week.

According to Yemeni law, the trial will take place in Aden, where the attack took place, the source said.

American officials have said they believe the operation was carried out by a network of small cells of two or three people, probably from one or more anti-American Islamist organizations, including the Islamic Jihad, Egypt's al-Gamaa al-Islamiya and Saudi dissident Osama bin Laden's followers.

All have connections to Afghanistan and are believed to have had operations in Yemen.

U.S. investigators have said the attack against the Cole bears the earmarks of operations carried out by followers of Bin Laden, the exiled Saudi millionaire and Afghanistan war veteran whom officials say ordered two bombings in East Africa.

The August 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania killed 224 people.

Officials have suggested that the attackers were from various Arab countries, including Yemen, Egypt, and Saudi Arabia, and that they may be operating from both Afghanistan and Yemen.

A security official, also speaking on condition of anonymity, said investigations have revealed that an Egyptian suspect whom he identified only as Hamdi fled Yemen a month before the bombing along with five others, including a Libyan man.

He said all six men had links to Islamic Jihad, but he did not elaborate further.

Holiday Hardships

Too much togetherness causes dread of seasonal festivities, familial gatherings

There's no place like home for the holidays, or at least that's what Bing Crosby said. With the holiday season already here, I am sure of one thing: Mr. Crosby didn't know my family.

Don't get me wrong, I love my family, but they are a psychology experiment waiting to happen, and from what my friends report, they might not be the only family out there that need to be committed to the loony bin in celebration of the birth of the Baby Jesus.

The night before Thanksgiving in our town, graduates of the local high school meet at a hole-in-the-wall bar to drink.

We try to drown our sorrows, we listen to each other's "here's what my family has done now" stories. It is good to see everyone. But the real reason we are there is to escape our families. We do this in preparation of the days to come. We know we are stuck for the next four days in the company of our families.

As soon as the sacrificial bird is placed on the table at Thanksgiving, my family kicks off the madness.

Oh sure, it starts with a drinking binge by one or more members of said extended family, and then throw a friendly little football contest into the mix. You've got a testosterone time bomb waiting to happen. Happen it has, on more than one occasion, we have had to break out the boxing gloves.

There is always that one relative who you have to walk on eggshells just to try to get along with — that person who just makes you want to run away and disclaim your family.

Undoubtedly they show up like clockwork. They suck the life right out of your celebration, and then once they've had their fun they leave while everyone tries to keep up the appearance of normalcy.

This year a friend was relieved that her aunt couldn't make it to her family celebration, in which the aunt usually berates her gay brother for his lifestyle.

"Gee, if you don't approve of the way I live my life in this, the start of holiest season of the year then yelling at me in front of all of our relatives will make me change it. Sure did the trick last year. Scared me straight until I saw your little Johnny pissing on Mom's Christmas tree — that kid is the best birth control around."

Last year, another friend's family spent the entire Thanksgiving Day arguing and crying, a special celebration that my family usually saves for a time closer to Christmas.

The day after Thanksgiving my family usually spends undoing all of the good feelings that we may have gained the day before. We complain about the relatives, we complain about the food, we complain about having to miss that really important football game because the facility my grandmother choose to have Thanksgiving at wasn't properly wired with cable.

"And did you see how much weight your aunt has gained? What about your cousin turning into a freak, what's that kid doing with her hair?" Then we drag out the tree and get ready to do it all again next month.

Now that's the spirit of the season. In a flash, Thanksgiving was gone; I just can't wait for Christmas.

Professors like Bryan Schurle was named the 2000 Kansas Professor of the Year. This marks the eighth time in the past 15 years someone from K-State has been recognized with this honor.

It takes special kinds of professors to earn this recognition. They must include an extraordinary commitment to excellence in their scholarly approach to instructing, as well as learning.

They must contribute to undergraduate learning, not only at the university, but in the community as well as the profession. They must have support from their colleagues as well.

Professors such as Schurle have this, and so much more.

► OUR VIEW

is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

This is a tremendous honor that shows the importance of having professors who care, not only about the material they are teaching, but, more importantly, about the students they teach.

Schurle is an example of what other professors should aim to be.

We are fortunate to have professors with this credit at our university. We hope others will follow this path and strive to be among the best professors in the country.

Group celebrates student leaders on campus

All right: no more hand counts, no more re-tallying ballots and please, don't tell us anymore about any pregnant chads.

Are you confused about who will lead our nation for the next four years? We see Vice President Al Gore and George W. Bush and we start to wonder what happened to the true servant leadership that developed our country into what it has become.

We look for this leadership and find two politicians trying to sneak their ways into the White House instead of truly following the will of the people. That's what servant leadership is, serving others before yourself.

Yet, we have these two politicians using their advisers and lawyers, ignoring our nation's people, and only searching for what's best for themselves, putting the nation on hold.

While we're all caught up into the confusion of this unique election year, we do need to take this example and look at what servant leadership truly is. And what better place to look than right here on our non-butterfly ballot campus.

We don't want any confusion here either. You might be asking yourself what a servant leader is. Don't worry, we've had plenty of others ask us the same question.

Well, the Leadership Theory and Practice textbook by Daft says that servant leadership is upside-down leadership. These leaders transcend self-interest to serve the needs of others, help others to grow and develop and provide opportunity for others to gain materially and emotionally. The fulfillment of others is the servant leader's principle aim.

Still confused? We realize that this is a wordy definition. We thought this complicated definition is best translated by some servant leaders we see on campus.

You know the kind of people we're talking about. Maybe it's that person who stays after your meeting and helps pick up trash and straighten out chairs. Or maybe it's that handsome young man who opens the door for you as you walk into our renovated Union. Or maybe it's even those random people who give you rides to class on that cold winter morning, even though you've never met them before in your entire life. What about that person who gave you a nice smile as you walked out of your 8:05 after receiving that not-so-hot grade on the last exam? And that great adviser who gives you her home phone number for any troubles or the one who stays until 7 in the evening to help you get your schedule figured out for next semester.

We feel that these individuals best exemplify servant leadership.

Servant leaders are not often recognized for the work that they do. They might not be the president or an officer in the organization. They're not searching for the spotlight, they just want to better the lives of those around them.

The servant leader in your group may be the first person to volunteer for that no-so-fun, time-consuming job.

This job might also be at the expense of that person, but this thought wouldn't even cross their mind. They might drop you an anonymous card or an e-mail just wishing you a great day or encouraging you to keep up the good work. These leaders are the spirit-lifters of your organization. They don't stand for put-downs, and they are able to resolve conflict between others, no matter if they are Democrats or Republicans.

Today we'd like to share with you our campaign for the next four years. No, this has nothing to do with medicare or Social Security or gun control.

We want to start today in recognizing those behind-the-scenes, servant leaders. We want to thank them for the tireless jobs they do to make our campus a better place for higher education. We want to celebrate their accomplishments in fulfilling the needs of others.

At 6:30 p.m. Tuesday, the celebrating will begin with the 2000 Blue Key Leadership Symposium Banquet, recognizing these students and advisers.

The banquet will be followed by a free, open-to-the-public keynote address starting at 8 p.m. in the main Union Ballroom.

This address will be given by a person who has been in our shoes before, a person that truly exemplifies what a servant leader is. Julie Beggs, from the Robert K. Greenleaf Center for Servant Leadership, will be sharing her thoughts on this subject.

The Manhattan and K-State community is invited to join us for this celebratory address on servant leadership.

There won't be any recoups, nor will there be any confusion. This will just be a celebration of the people who put a smile on your face and have invariably touched your life in one way or another. They are true servant leaders.

READERS WRITE

Faculty should be more explicit with expectations

Editor,

It has come to my attention that several of our faculty on this campus feel that tardiness is unacceptable.

To remedy this problem one professor, in particular, asks students to leave his class as he was "too far along" in his lecture.

Another professor went so far to say that he would lock the door after the bell rang, if he could. However, he refrains from doing this at it is a fire hazard.

My main concern is that this practice of asking students to leave due to tardiness is not stated anywhere to my knowledge.

The code of conduct does not include "faculty may request students to leave if tardy."

In the class I was asked to leave, nowhere in the syllabus was this rule stated, although it did strongly encourage attending our enrolled class.

My feelings are that I have the right to attend a class I have paid for, even if I was seven minutes late.

Now, if I were violating the code of conduct, there would be no excuse for the professor to ask me to leave. But I can't help but feel some faculty have given "a really wide berth" when it comes to their rules, as one university expert quoted when I interviewed him.

If faculty members continue to enforce such rules, as the one mentioned above, they should include them in their course syllabus.

This would create an understanding between students and teachers from day one and remain constant throughout the semester.

If this goes unattended, K-State's philosophy, as it says in a leaflet put in every letter to freshmen, of "Putting Students First" is a farce. Instead, it should read "Putting Faculty First, to ensure the best education for our students."

1-lane street will remain

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Entering the northeast outlet of the K-State Student Union parking lot from Mid Campus Drive will not be an option anytime soon.

The portion of Mid Campus Drive that switched to a one-lane, one-way street Aug. 11 at the northeast exit of Lot A-29 and ends where Vattier Street and Mid Campus Drive intersect will remain the same.

Only northbound traffic is allowed on the street's one-lane portion, and westbound traffic from Vattier must turn north by Anderson Hall.

Gerald Carter, director of university facility planning and campus architect, said a couple of traffic-signal additions have been added to the area since August, and the location of stop signs has been changed.

"We made alterations where people are or are not responding to the changes," Carter said.

At the beginning of the semester, one-way street signs were put up, yellow tape was removed from the road and a barricade with a "Do Not Enter" sign was set up south of Anderson Hall to make changes known to drivers.

He said traffic flow has been moving along fine, and it's been a positive change as far as he can tell.

The change actually switched Mid Campus Drive back to the one-way street it was before 1994. Construction of the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art in 1994 caused the road between the Union and Anderson Hall to become two-way.

After a student was struck by a vehicle on Mid Campus Drive while crossing the two-way street on foot last November, the situation was re-evaluated.

"A lot of people have said thank you for changing it, especially since that student was hit there," Carter said. "It's a lot safer now."

Carter said the width of the road was so small that it was hard to accomplish anything. The two-way road consisted of a bike lane and three crosswalks.

David Plous, junior in mass communications, said he has had trouble adjusting to the one-lane, one-way street.

"I was used to turning left into the Union there. One time I forgot, and I had to drive all the way through campus to get back to the Union," Plous said. "Now I'm more familiar with the change, and I realize there probably was too much traffic crammed into the street."

K-State Police Lt. Richard Herrman said most of campus is used to the one-way street.

"We're still keeping an eye on traffic there to make sure they realize it's one-way," Herrman said. "There haven't been any complaints or problems as far as I know. Everything is flowing much better now."

Social-service organizations offer opportunities for involvement

By CHARLIE MORASCH
Kansas State Collegian

One Manhattan man was not asking for much, but the Manhattan Emergency Shelter worked to meet his needs.

"He had no food or shelter — all he wanted were Snickers bars," Junell Norris, executive director of the shelter, said. "We were able to find out that he had an interest in cooking, and after receiving the cooking presents we got for him, he had tears in his eyes."

K-State students have many opportunities to get involved in community activities over the holiday season like the one Norris described.

Social-service organizations such as the Manhattan Emergency Shelter, the Flint Hills Breadbasket and others said help is always welcome.

"We have a variety of different things volunteers can do over the holidays," said Junell Norris, executive director of the Manhattan Emergency Shelter.

"First and foremost would be help for our Thanksgiving and Christmas meals. We have people coordinating both of those, but we can always use more volunteers. Also, the week before Christmas we are needing people to assist in wrapping gifts for guests of the shelter."

Norris said if students don't have as much time to donate, they are also welcome to participate in the organization's ornament program. People who participate pick an ornament off of a Christmas tree at the shelter. The ornament lists the name, age and interests of a person or family that would not otherwise receive presents.

"Every year at least one family comes and registers for the ornament program the day before Christmas," Norris said. "The kids are always afraid that Santa won't be able to find them. People are always needed to help make Christmas better for these people."

Norris said residence hall floors have often participated in the ornament program, making it less expensive.

"Dorms, and different floors of dorms, have done this program a lot in the past and have really had a fun time with it," she said.

Other groups have been fortunate enough that they are not needing many volunteers over the holiday season.

Dan Purcel, assistant director of Flint Hills Breadbasket, said Manhattan has been so supportive of the Flint Hills Breadbasket that he isn't asking for more volunteers.

"We have things pretty much filled up," Purcel said. "We've had a really good response from the community."

Purcel said there will be one opportunity for students to work over the holiday season at the Flint Hills Breadbasket when holiday baskets are assembled Dec. 17.

"If anyone wishes to volunteer, we ask them to call so we can have a spot for them," Purcel said.

Vicky Terril, assistant director of Big Brothers and Big Sisters of Manhattan, said her organization is in need of volunteers, but not volunteers exclusively over the holiday season.

"We just had our bingo night, so currently we don't need anyone unless they can do one of our programs," Terril said. "We have a program for college students to be a big brother or big sister, and we have the regular program for being a big brother or big sister. That's pretty much all we're asking for right now."

Norris said that people shouldn't underestimate the effect of a simple gift.

"All that man wanted were candy bars, and because of a few people giving he had a great Christmas," she said.

Morrison quits team

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Senior guard Galen Morrison has elected to leave the K-State men's basketball team, head coach Jim Wooldridge announced Friday.

MORRISON

"We would like to wish Galen the best of luck in the future," Wooldridge said. "However, at this point in time, it is in the best interest of Galen and our program if he moves on. It is unfortunate that he will no longer be a part of our program."

Specific reasons for Morrison's departure have not been disclosed. Morrison, a 6-foot shooting guard, was the team's leading returning scorer this season, posting 11.9 points per game last year, while also ranking third in the Big 12 in three-point shooting (64 of 147).

This season he played in just one regular-season game after suffering a sprained left ankle in the team's opening exhibition game, Nov. 6, against the Global Sports All-Stars. Nevertheless, Morrison scored 10 points and drilled 3-of-8 from downtown in the Wildcats' 76-66 loss to Wichita State on Tuesday.

The Omaha, Neb., native came to K-State last season after two years at Iowa Western Community College. Morrison missed the last six games of the 1999-2000 campaign after then-head coach Tom Asbury suspended him for disciplinary reasons, and subsequently, he was dismissed from the team. Morrison was then reinstated by Wooldridge following the first-year head coach's hiring in March.

Cross country finishes 10th

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Temperatures were not ideal in Ames, Iowa, when a minus-19 degree wind chill greeted women's cross country for the 2000 NCAA National Championship on Nov. 20. Head coach Randy Cole's squad came into the race aiming for a top-10 finish, and behind sophomore Amy Mortimer's sixth overall time of 20:50.1 out of more than 250 runners, the Cats finished right where Cole expected them to — 10th overall.

Region honors

Wildcat head coach Randy Cole and sophomore standout runner Amy Mortimer were named the NCAA Midwest Region's coach and female runner of the year, respectively. This marks Cole's third straight Coach of the Year honor. Mortimer, the 1999 Freshman of the Year, earned All-Big 12 and All-Midwest Region honors for the second straight year.

Weather, it seemed, was not on Mortimer's mind, either. "The last half was with the wind," she said. "I got a little hot and ripped off my gloves and hat, and that seemed to give me some energy. I knew it was nationals and I had to lay it on the line."

Mortimer's energy surge in the last half of the race was enough to tie her with Chris Vanatta (1986) for the best NCAA individual finish ever for a Wildcat.

Meanwhile, Korene Hinds finished 12th overall with a time of 20:56.5. She earned her third-consecutive All-American honor, the first K-State runner to ever achieve that mark. Hinds said she was proud of both her individual and team success after the race.

"I'm pretty excited to finish my career like this," Hinds said. "I'll feel good looking back on my career at K-State. I'm proud of this team."

Cole said he was proud of his team's success at the race, especially that of Mortimer and Hinds.

"Amy and Korene have proven they're among the elite college runners," Cole said. —K-State Sports Information contributed to this article.

A NEAR VICTORY

Volleyball team flirts with history against Nebraska

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Three points separated K-State from making history. Never before has a Wildcat volleyball team defeated Nebraska in Manhattan, and it nearly happened Saturday night in front of a record crowd of 5,225 at Ahearn Field House.

In the fifth and deciding game, the top-ranked Cornhuskers (28-0, 20-0) edged No. 22 K-State (20-8, 14-6) 15-12 to claim the match, dashing Cat hopes of a record-breaking upset. Nevertheless, K-State joined No. 11 UCLA as just the second team this season to take Nebraska to five games, including the first Cat team in Manhattan since 1981, before losing the contest, 10-15, 15-9, 16-14, 6-15, 12-15.

"It was a huge disappointment, but we put ourselves in a position to win the thing, and not many people can say they did that," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "The disappointing thing is we're competitors. We're K-State, and we like to win, and when you don't win it's really hard."

"So yeah, we'll feel it, but the regular season is over and now we have new life in the (NCAA) tournament, and this team can make a run."

Despite K-State's loss to NU, the Cats will finish the regular season in a three-way tie for second place in the Big 12 with Missouri and Texas A&M. High expectations emanate from such an impressive finish, McLaughlin said.

"We finished higher than any K-State team tied for second, and I think we can go further in the tournament than any K-State team, so that's our goal," he said.

However, McLaughlin won't deny the Huskers are favored to win the national title, with or without sophomore phenom Laura Plakowski, who sat out the K-State/Nebraska match Saturday after undergoing a laparoscopic appendectomy Tuesday.

"I think Nebraska's still the favorite team to win it," McLaughlin said. "I've measured their numbers. I've measured them offensively and defensively. Without Plakowski, they can still win the national title, but we'd like another shot at them."

Besides, K-State's performance Saturday on Senior Night shouldn't hurt the Cats' confidence level at all, junior outside hitter Liz Wegner said.

"We took the No. 1 team in the nation to five, and we almost beat them. What more can you say than that," she said.

Nebraska took game one 15-10, but K-State quickly countered and evened the match at 1-1. The Cats took a 1-0 lead and never trailed again in game two, winning by a 15-9 count and holding the Huskers to .000 hitting efficiency.

McLaughlin said freshmen Carl Jensen and Lauren Goehring showed much poise at that stage of the match.

"We were very composed after a tough first game, and we did it with two freshmen on the floor," he said. "I thought those guys elevated a little bit, so we're maturing."

Then in the third game, K-State overcame a 6-1 deficit, as Wegner's kill gave the Cats a 16-14 win and a 2-1 lead in the match.

"We're kind of known for coming back," junior outside hitter Lisa Mimick said. "We don't ever want to give up on a game. I think we showed them that we can play with them and that we won't really back down to anybody."

However, game four was all Nebraska. The Huskers won handily, 15-6, forcing a critical rally point game five.

There, a Wegner kill knotted the score at 12, causing NU head coach John Cook to call a timeout. But the Huskers leveled off the final three points to claim the game and the match.

Nonetheless, Saturday proved K-State was a much different team than the one the Huskers swept 3-0 on Oct. 18 in Lincoln, McLaughlin said.

"We were just a better volleyball team in all areas. We served better, and we're at home on Record finish

K-State's second-place finish in the Big 12 this season is the highest conference finish in K-State history, surpassing the 1985 team's third-place finish in the Big 8 standings.

Life at Ahearn

The loss to Nebraska ended the Wildcats' school-record 15-match home winning streak in Ahearn Field House. K-State finished the regular season with a 12-1 home record, which ties the 1996 team for the most home wins in school history, while the .923 home winning percentage is the highest in school history.

License to kill

K-State's 97 total kills in the match with Nebraska rank as the third-most kills in a five-game match in school history, while the Wildcats' 259 total attacks ranks second most in a five-game match. For the first time in the Jim McLaughlin era, three Wildcats tallied 20 or more kills in a match, as junior Liz Wegner (25), freshman Cam Jensen (23) and junior Lisa Mimick (21) each eclipsed the 20-kill barrier in the five-game heartbreaker.

Running the offense

Junior setter Disney Bronnenberg posted the second-most assists in a five-game match in school history with 86 in the match against the Huskers.

Career performance

Mimick broke career-highs in both kills and digs, as the junior tallied her first career 20-20 double-double with 21 kills on .265 hitting and a team-best 29 digs in the loss to the unbeaten Cornhuskers. Mimick's 29 digs are the fourth-most in K-State history in a five-game match. She leads the team and ranks second in the Big 12 in overall digs with a 4.14 per-game average.

K-State moves on to Friday's NCAA Tournament 1st round

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Carl Jensen attempts to block Anna Schrad's hit during K-State's loss to Nebraska in Ahearn Field House.

K-State's volleyball team will play Loyola University of Chicago in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

The No. 22 Cats (20-8) will see action at 5 p.m. Friday in Sacramento, Calif., against the Ramblers (22-8), who earned an automatic berth by winning the Midwestern Collegiate Conference Tournament.

If K-State wins that match, it will play again at 7 p.m. Saturday.

The bracket sits just fine with head coach Jim McLaughlin.

"There's no surprises when you're dealing with the NCAA committee. You never really know, and I don't know if there's a true formula for it," he said. "You just have to be prepared, and I think we're fine with our draw, and I think we can win both matches, but we have to take care of Loyola, Chicago, first."

This marks the fifth consecutive appearance in the tournament for K-State, a school record.

Five other Big 12 teams also made the bracket, including Nebraska, the No. 1 seed in the Central Region; Missouri; Texas Tech; Colorado; and Texas A&M. The six teams entered by the Big 12 ties with the Pac 10 and Big 10 for the most by any conference.

Despite that number, only Nebraska will be host to first- and second-round matches, a paradox that puzzled McLaughlin, who, after the Nebraska game on Saturday, said he thought there would be two or three Big 12 schools to be host to matches.

"The only thing that concerns me or surprises me is that six teams made it from the Big 12 and only one team hosts. That's a little confusing to me," he said. "I don't know why they have that the way it is, but that's the only thing that's disappointing."

"I thought we were going to get a host."

Having only one team be host is especially surprising when considering the Big 12 Conference's power rating, which is in the top four in the nation, McLaughlin said.

Nevertheless, the bracket is set, and the Cats must now prepare for Loyola, McLaughlin said.

"We'll go back to the office, we'll get some stats on them, and then we'll get the films and check their schedules and we'll be prepared," he said.

"We're on a three-day preparation phase right now, and it will start tonight."

Freshman comes close to breaking school basketball records in Beaver Classic

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

Women's basketball coach Deb Patterson said it was time for K-State to take its young squad on the road after freshman Nicole Ohlde's 14-point performance against Western Illinois lifted K-State to an early 2-0 record.

K-State got that chance Friday and Saturday nights in Corvallis, Ore., when the Cats participated in the Beaver Classic.

Ohlde again made her presence felt in the Cats' first game against Wyoming by leading the team in both points (36) and rebounds (19).

The Clay Center, Kan., native accounted for more than half of K-State's total points, but the team's 28 turnovers led to a first-round overtime loss at the hands of the Cowgirls, 73-70.

In only her second collegiate game, the freshman phenom was just two points off school-record setters Shawnda DeCamp and LeAnn Wilcox and fell one rebound shy of Carlisa Thomas' record 20 boards.

Things looked good for K-State heading into the second half up 33-30, but a lackluster 2-for-22 performance from behind the three-point arc spoiled the Cats' bid for their first 3-0 start since the 1996-97 season.

Friday's loss against Wyoming meant K-State would play a Princeton team that lost to host Oregon State on Saturday night in the third-place game.

Senior guard Kim Woodlee came out determined to get her team back on the right track and led the Cats with 17 points, 15 of which came off three-pointers.

Leading just 43-41 with 13:54 to play in the game, K-State took advantage of a full-court press and went on a 12-0 run that would take the wind out of the Tigers for good.

The Cats' defensive pressure held Princeton to just 38-percent shooting and 18 points in the second half, while K-State bounced back to shoot 11-of-24 from three-point range to win the game, 63-51.

Ohlde followed up her near record-setting performance Friday night by adding eight points and six rebounds in the win over the Tigers, tying the Beaver

Breaking new ground

Experienced writer/director produces thoughtful film

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

Don't go in expecting to see a sequel to everyone's favorite movie about a boy who sees dead people.

M. Night Shyamalan, writer and director of "The Sixth Sense," has broken new ground in this thriller about the basic battle of heroism vs. villainy.

Bruce Willis plays David Dunne, a man who discovers he is seemingly "invincible" after being the sole survivor of a large train wreck.

On the other end of the spectrum is the character of Elijah Price, played by Samuel L. Jackson, whose limbs break like glass by even the slightest fall. The fate of the two men collide as they find they are connected by these eerie traits.

This film has been met with mixed reviews by most critics, and even I am still trying to determine where I stand on it. Some find the film to move slowly and to be anti-climactic, while others hail it as a "superhero epic."

Apparently, Shyamalan knows a good thing when he sees one. There's no way to avoid comparing "Unbreakable" to "The Sixth Sense."

Both share Willis' name, both deal with some aspect of the supernatural and both have similar character types: Spencer Treat Clark plays Dunne's son, who definitely knows more than he seems, much like Haley Joel Osment's character in "The Sixth Sense," and Robin Wright-Penn is Dunne's wife, a horribly underdeveloped character.

Toni Collette, who played Osment's mother in "The Sixth Sense," would have done a much better job in the role.

Everything about this movie (save the predictable ending) is genius. The cinematography is incredible, and the camera angles and shots make you feel as if you're in the middle of the action.

The acting of Willis and Jackson is enough to carry the movie (it helps that both characters have well-developed backgrounds) since it lacks the stunning visuals of "The Sixth Sense."

Beneath the seemingly basic theme of good vs. evil, there is much symbolism and many thought-provoking scenes that question the limits of the human body, mind and spirit.

While some of you will be disappointed that this isn't a second "The Sixth Sense," the rest of you will know that this movie is just as fascinating and will only strengthen Shyamalan's career as a writer and director.

Close fails to carry story in live-action sequel

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

As if 101 Dalmations weren't enough, one more has joined the litter of puppies this holiday season.

"102 Dalmations," the sequel to the 1996 live-action film (based on the animated film from Walt Disney), opened this Thanksgiving weekend to hordes of screaming children and their exhausted parents. The movie sold out at box offices across the country, but not because it was good ... it was because families had arrived expecting to see "The Grinch," which was sold out. The puppies were just a last resort.

In this latest installment, a new puppy is welcomed into the family by its parents, Pongo and Perdita. This Dalmatian puppy, however, is spotless, and just the rarity that our dastardly villain Cruella DeVil (Glenn Close) is looking for.

You can tell that Close has fun in her role as Cruella, one of the most popular Disney villains of all time. This lighthearted film is a break from her more dramatic performances. But Cruella is the only good thing about this movie. Disney should have stuck to the original 1996 live-action movie. After all, when was the last time you saw a Disney movie and said, "I can't wait for the sequel?"

These movies are in special categories all their own and can stand by themselves. They don't need sequels to justify their popularity. Besides, most of the sequels that Disney makes are straight-to-video releases anyway.

The addition of an additional cuddly puppy is the excuse for making this movie. Close and the rest of the cast are lively and animated, but it doesn't carry the "story" (if it can be said that there is one).

Adults will get an occasional chuckle, and the kids will love it for the simple fact that it bears the Disney name (oh yes, and for the fact that dogs are involved).

Disney would've been better off leaving the first live-action version, and the animated original, alone and moving on to perhaps making another live action film out of an animated classic.

In this case, the cliché of "Lightning doesn't strike twice" stands true.

Tupac's latest album features poetry, songs from book

Review by SARAH MCCAFFREY
Kansas State Collegian

Tupac Shakur's latest work reaches out from beyond the grave to make a powerful impression on its listeners.

"The Rose That Grew From Concrete, Vol. 1" is a compilation of Tupac's poetry that is interpreted by different musical artists, writers and actors.

Some of the musical acts featured on the CD include Mos Def, Red Rat, Q-Tip and Dead Prez. Danny Glover and Malcolm Jamal Warner are a few of the actors that lend their interpretations to the disc.

The CD comprises songs from Tupac's book, "The Rose That Grew From Concrete," released last year. With the exception of the opening interlude, all 24 of the tracks are poems written by Tupac.

In the opening interlude, Tupac talks about the cultural emergence of rap into mainstream society and its importance as a teaching tool. He compares the rap stars of today to the African poets of the past who passed on history and lessons about life to their audiences.

Many of Tupac's poems deal with recurring themes in his life. When "Ure Heart Turns Cold," "Sometimes I Cry" and "Thug Blues" all dwell on the loneliness that was a part of the deceased rapper's life.

"Sometimes I Cry" is wrought with the emotions of a man who felt that the world didn't care about him as a person or his problems.

Another theme found in many of the tracks is love and loyalty. Tupac expresses his belief that love can heal all wounds and reveals a tender emotional side in poems such as "And Still I Love You" and "If There Be Pain."

The symbolic meaning of the title track is referred to in several of the poems. "The Rose That Grew From Concrete" is a metaphor Tupac applied to his life and his accomplishments. It is about the struggle and the obstacles that Tupac had to overcome in his life to attain success.

With a somber yet realistic grasp on his life, Tupac's "In The Event Of My Demise" was a morbid prediction that came true. The visionary outlook that Tupac had on his life is a shock to the ear at first. Tupac says he knows he will die before his time and he has come to terms with this notion. He only hopes that when he does die it will be for a principle or belief that he fought for while he was alive.

music review

"The Rose That Grew From Concrete, Vol. 1"

By Tupac Shakur

The artists who interpret Tupac's poetry express the emotions of a man who was much more human than many people thought the rap star to be. All the interpreters employ different styles to get the message across to listeners. Some use rap, others merely speak the words as Tupac himself may have spoken them. Some even speak in native tongues. Hip hop, salsa, tribal chants and ballads all accompany the interpretation.

The artists on this CD might interpret the poems musically in ways that do not reflect Tupac's style, but they all remain true to the message the author was trying to relay.

This CD is a jewel in the rough, much like Tupac himself.

our floor, and I thought we got on their tendencies a little bit better. We played a more intelligent game, and we played hard."

McLaughlin said the home court was a noticeable advantage, despite the many Husker fans who made the trip to Manhattan.

"I couldn't hear myself in the huddle, and I loved it. It was really neat," he said Saturday. "The crowd tonight was awesome. They were so loud, and this place was rockin'."

The emotional level of McLaughlin's players was soaring as well against the Huskers, an element that must be sustained heading into the NCAA Tournament, McLaughlin said.

"We've got some girls from Nebraska, and it's easy to get fired up for the No. 1 team, but we need to maintain our level of intensity going into the tournament against a team we've never played before," he said.

"That will be the key for our success."

outside of it. He said students should not learn material solely from the textbook.

"The subject matter that we discuss in my classes is essential for students to learn because they need to understand how markets work as our nation continues to move toward a market economy," Schurle said.

In addition to the 2000 Professor of the Year award, Schurle has received many national and campus honors while teaching at K-State.

In 1996, he was one of 10 regional winners of the Excellence in College and University Teaching in Food and Agricultural Sciences Award from the U.S. Department of Agriculture and the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges.

"We are delighted that Bryan Schurle has been selected as the state's top professor," Jon Wefald, K-State president, said. "It is a fitting award as Dr. Schurle is among K-State's most honored teachers at both the university and national level."

The award will be presented to Schurle at a luncheon in the next month.

This accomplishment has served as a motivational tool for Schurle and other K-State faculty members.

"It is an exceptional honor to represent the campus this way," Schurle said. "There are an awful lot of outstanding teachers on this campus and it is unfortunate that there are not enough awards to go around."

doggedly pursued more legal avenues for changing the totals yet again.

"This is one of the most amazing legal chess games we've ever seen played," said Laurie Levenson, a professor at Loyola University Law School in Los Angeles. "I don't think even the parties know what their next move will be."

Bush has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to review the Florida Supreme Court's ruling that the hand recounts requested by Gore should go forward. The U.S. court has scheduled arguments in the case for Friday.

Baker said the certification by Harris would not change the Bush campaign's plan to pursue its appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court.

It has become evident that the outcome of the presidential election will depend heavily on legal sorites by the army of lawyers who have found new challenges in the murky depths of Florida election law.

"Because we're in uncharted waters, it's almost impossible to know all the legal options. They're being created every day," said Levenson.

For now, there are some clear moves ahead:

— Secretary of State Katherine Harris was to receive the results Sunday of all votes in the state including recounts in scattered counties.

— The declaration of the final totals opens the door for contests to be filed by the unsuccessful candidate and counter-contests to be filed by the candidate with more votes.

— Gore lawyers will challenge results in Miami-Dade County where disputed votes were never fully recounted by hand. The canvassing board said they couldn't finish in time and just quit counting.

— Bush lawyers have already begun lawsuits challenging the exclusion of overseas and military ballots eliminated for such things as missing postmarks.

— Gore lawyers may challenge the results from Palm Beach County where multiple problems exist. So-called dimpled ballots were never counted and many voters claimed they were so confused by a "butterfly ballot" form that they mistakenly voted for Pat Buchanan rather than Al Gore.

— A challenge in Seminole County was possible involving some 15,000 absentee ballots amid allegations that Republicans wrongly tampered with ballot applications on behalf of GOP voters.

The end of the line for all the legal maneuvering could be Friday's hearing before the U.S. Supreme Court.

"The dead end could be the Supreme Court," said Levenson. "They may direct the participants to where the buck stops."

ROBBIE WILLIAMS

Sing When You're Winning, Capitol Records
by Steve Lichtenstein
Brash, Arrogant, Self-indulgent. Possibly the best words to sum up Robbie Williams, whose second US album (following 1999's appropriately titled The Ego Has Landed) finds the former Take That star (the UK's New Kids, er, Backstreet, or N'Sync of the early 90's) at his pop masterful best. Whether it be subtle, earnest ballads like "Better Man" and "Love Calling Earth," or groove thumpers like the infectious "Rock DJ" (with its stunning/nauseating video) or "Knutsford City Limits," Williams is definitely winning. Hence all the singing. Might as well add superb to the list and bulk up the ego a little more. GPA: 3.6 — Help Robbie's insecurity and listen to: "Let Love Be Your Energy," "The Road to Mandalay," "Rock DJ"

CREEPER LAGOON

Watering Ghost Garden, spinART Records
by Steve Lichtenstein
A little bit of everything blots indie fav Creeper Lagoon's new EP, Watering Ghost Garden, a six song hodge-podge of layered, atmospheric rock. The abstract, disassociated bravado ("Time sits on a corner/curling up inside a glass") of the flaming lips-tinged "Roman Hearts" gives way to the modern rock radio feel of "Big Money Struggle." All things considered, the brief album is more than enough to give fans salivating for the San Franciscan's next full-length effort something of substance to chew on until then. GPA: 3.1 — Go swimming in: "My Friends Adore You," "Big Money Struggle"

WASHINGTON, D.C. — After nearly three weeks of uncertainty, Americans are growing restless. Al Gore faces the tough challenge of persuading the court of public opinion, as well as the legal courts, that his presidential quest is still legitimate.

"I don't think there's any question but that he's got an uphill fight," former White House chief of staff Leon Panetta, a Democrat, said Monday.

"Everything is operating against him now," presidential historian Henry Graff said.

Time is running out as court cases stack up. Gore is on the defense, searching for more votes and voters' patience, while Republican George W. Bush tries to act presidential, reaching for the keys to the White House and beginning to assemble a Cabinet.

A day after Bush was certified the winner in Florida, Gore sought to counter the impression that the contest was over.

"If every vote is counted," Gore said in a phone call with Democratic allies, "there are easily more than enough to change the outcome and decide the election in our favor."

Gore's court filings went a step further, saying not only that all the votes should be counted but that the vice president already should be declared the winner. Gore's lawyers asked a Tallahassee court to certify that the true and accurate results of the 2000 presidential election in Florida show Gore and running mate Joseph Lieberman as the winners.

While battling on the legal front, Gore launched a public relations offensive, answering Bush's urging that he should quit. Gore recognizes his cause would be lost if public sentiment turns against him.

The vice president arranged a prime-time, nationally broadcast address to present his case.

Gore had a televised conference call with Democratic leaders of the House and Senate who assured him that Democrats have been entirely supportive of finding out how everyone voted — even though there was some isolated grumbling within the party. At the White House, President Clinton joined Gore's unity chorus.

In Bush's camp, there was a determined effort to focus on White House planning as if all the confusing legal challenges really didn't matter. Of course, it was Bush's team that brought the election to the U.S. Supreme Court in a challenge to Florida recounts. That pivotal case will be heard Friday.

Panetta, a respected voice in the political world, said both candidates should stop at the Supreme Court rather than take the battle to the House of Representatives.

"Once the Supreme Court makes a decision, by God, both candidates ought to abide by it," Panetta told The Associated Press. "Any candidate who tries to take it beyond that will be not only testing the patience of the American people but, I think, will be producing the kind of constitutional crisis we don't need. Up to this point we've had a political crisis. What we don't need is a constitutional crisis."

Panetta did not seem hopeful about Gore's prospects. "Harry Truman had to give in on seizing the steel mills," he said. "Richard Nixon had to give up his tapes. It may be that Gore may have to give up his effort at his presidency as a result of whatever the court says."

Senate Democratic leader Tom Daschle acknowledged that Democrats are working against the clock. Dec. 12 is the deadline for choosing Florida's electors. The Republican-controlled state legislature has threatened to take over the job.

Alumni gifts rank highest in Big 12

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students aren't the only ones who think their school is one of the top in the Big 12 Conference.

The alumni do, too.

According to the 1999 Voluntary Support of Education report, K-State's percentage of alumni who give charitable gifts to the university is the highest percentage of any other Big 12 school. With a 28-percent alumni participation rate, this means K-State received at least one donation from 33,496 people out of 119,000 alumni solicited for donations.

Gary Hellebust, president and CEO of the KSU Foundation's local agency, said this news is an indicator of the level of alumni support and the success of the Foundation.

"This reflects the loyalty of our alumni and the KSU Foundation," he said. "It's a combination of alumni loyalty and an extremely effective alumni giving program."

Hellebust said in addition to K-State's No. 1 rank in alumni donations in the Big 12, the school also ranks among the top 10 nationally.

Alumni donations usually come in cash, stocks, bonds and real estate.

Julie Lea, director of communications for the Foundation's local agency, said individuals can designate their gifts in a variety of ways.

"Most gifts are designated to go to the donor's particular college, but many people also create scholarships or give money to the dean's fund with their money," she said.

Lea said the foundation raises money for all nine colleges within K-State. KSU Libraries, multicultural programs and the university's Center for Cancer Research.

The cornerstone of this high alumni participation, Lea said, is the KSU Foundation Telefund, which takes place each year during February.

Telefund consists of student volunteers who call alumni and request financial gifts for the university.

"Telefund is a cornerstone because the students make so many alumni contacts within one month," Lea said.

She said donations help improve the quality of K-State programs.

"All of the donations that are given by alumni and friends really expand the fine academic program and fine faculty and staff at the university," she said.

Michael Smith, vice-president for development for the KSU Foundation, said the donations from the 1999 fiscal year totaled $40 million. He said most gifts were as high as $500, but some gifts exceed that amount. Last year's total of $40 million allowed the foundation to reach a new annual record.

"Overall, from top to bottom, K-State has alumni that gives back, whether it's those who have been out for a while or those who just graduated," he said. "They realize there's a need, and they know what action is expected of them."

A new K-State men's basketball coach is not the only addition to Bramlage Coliseum this year. A new floor was added, along with tri-sided shot clocks above each basket. A scoreboard with player stats and a Jumbotron was also one of the additions.

REKINDLING NOSTALGIA

■ Bramlage Coliseum enhancements provide atmosphere for Wildcat fans.

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

If memories of K-State's elite basketball program of old are beginning to fade for fans, the new look of Bramlage Coliseum will try to rekindle that nostalgia.

For the first time since it opened 13 years ago, Bramlage is sporting a new look, and the first sight to greet fans when they enter is a purple mural along the top of the concourse, celebrating the history of all K-State athletics.

Visitors now will have a reason to traverse the entire concourse instead of heading immediately to their seats, said Charlie Thomas, Director of Bramlage Coliseum.

"We wanted to ingest a little bit of visual interest in the concourse by adding some color and variety. It had kind of a sterile feel before," he said. "We wanted to instill a good feeling and make people want to come back. We want them to feel good walking around the building."

"Before, there was probably a whole segment of the basketball population that just went straight from the doors to their seat and probably never even saw the other side of the arena."

Once visitors do enter the actual gym, however, they will notice even more renovations. First, a new floor with new designs have been added, and immediately above rests a giant, four-sided scoreboard that features 108-square-foot Sony video panels on each side.

In an effort to increase the fans' enjoyment of the game, the new scoreboard will display player points

Mayor's Holiday Tree Lighting Ceremony set for Wednesday

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Mayor Karen McCulloh and Manhattan residents will celebrate the season of giving in Aggieville on Wednesday.

The Mayor's Holiday Tree Lighting Ceremony will take place at 5:30 p.m. in Triangle Park.

The lighting, which is put on by the Flint Hills Breadbasket and Aggieville Business Association, raises food and money for underprivileged families, said Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the breadbasket.

"We're lighting the season of giving," she said. "Hopefully, it will continue for the next 12 months. It sure needs to."

People are encouraged to bring non-perishable food items, Bramhall said.

There will be boxes placed throughout the park for donations.

The K-State choir also will perform, and refreshments will be served.

Before the lighting, the Ballard Memorial Arbor will be dedicated to Sonny Ballard and his father, Charles.

Ballard was a giving man who deserves recognition, Bramhall said.

"Sonny Ballard is one those individuals that the Mayor's Holiday Tree would not be happening without him," she said. "He did so much for Aggieville and Manhattan."

Ballard died a couple of years ago from cancer, Bramhall said, but his contributions will continue to benefit the community. Still, there is more work to be done.

Cheryl Sieben, director of the Aggieville Business Association, said the holiday tree campaign tries to do just this.

"It brings awareness to the hunger problem in our community," she said.

McCulloh said she, too, thinks this spread awareness.

"Whenever you can draw people's atten-

Manhattan businesses face liquor violations

Hearings are pending on four alcohol violations that were issued against Manhattan drinking establishments Nov. 11. Alcohol Beverage Control does not release the names of businesses cited until hearings on the violations are concluded. Scott Holeman, communications director, said. He said he did not know if the citations were for one or more bars.

Thirty-one violations were issued in all. Six people were cited for minor in possession of alcohol. One person outside a bar was cited for disorderly conduct, obstruction of legal process and battery to a law enforcement officer.

The ABC also implemented its Cops in Shops program in three liquor stores in Manhattan on Nov. 11, allowing undercover ABC agents to observe liquor sales. Twenty people were cited for liquor violations under this program. Four were charged with furnishing alcohol to a minor, and 16 were charged with minor in possession.

Those cited ranged in age from 17 to 24. The ABC usually does one check a semester in Manhattan, Holeman said. Stores and bars are chosen for checks either randomly by a computer or because complaints have been received, he said.

Topeka student found murdered in car Sunday

TOPEKA — A high school student found dead inside a crashed vehicle Sunday in Topeka had been shot, police said.

Police are investigating the death of Ontario Prince Johnson, 16, as a homicide. No arrests have been made.

Johnson was a junior at Highland Park High School. An autopsy is scheduled.

A police report indicated Johnson was killed Sunday between 2:30 a.m. and 7:23 a.m. Police responded to a call of an accident at 7:20 a.m. and when they arrived, they found Johnson's body in the vehicle.

He was Topeka's 16th homicide victim this year. The city recorded 15 in 1999.

Supreme Court debates medical marijuana use

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The Supreme Court entered the debate over medical marijuana Monday, agreeing to decide whether the drug can be provided to patients out of medical necessity even though federal law makes its distribution a crime.

The justices said they will hear the Clinton administration's effort to bar a California group from providing the drug to seriously ill patients for pain and nausea relief.

A lower court decision allowing the Oakland Cannabis Buyers' Cooperative to distribute the drug threatens the government's ability to enforce the federal drug laws, government lawyers said.

The group's lawyer, Annette P. Carnegie, said Monday the federal Controlled Substances Act does not prohibit the distribution of marijuana for medical reasons.

Marijuana has been effective in relieving nausea in cancer patients undergoing chemotherapy, weight loss in HIV-positive patients and in reducing pain, she said.

Eight states in addition to California have medical-marijuana laws in place or approved by voters: Alaska, Arizona, Hawaii, Maine, Oregon, Washington, Nevada and Colorado.

In August, the Supreme Court barred the California organization from distributing marijuana while the government pursued its appeal.

Justice Stephen G. Breyer did not participate in the case. His brother, Charles, a federal trial judge in San Francisco, previously barred distribution of marijuana only to have his decision reversed by a federal appeals court.

California's law, passed by the voters in 1996, authorizes the possession and use of marijuana for medical purposes upon a doctor's recommendation.

Microsoft files challenge to court's breakup order

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Seeking to keep its business intact, Microsoft filed legal briefs Monday alleging the federal judge who ordered its breakup compromised the appearance of impartiality.

In its first filing with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which now has custody of the landmark case, Microsoft lambasted U.S. District Judge Thomas Penfield Jackson as a biased judge who thrust himself into the dispute rather than resolve it impartially.

Microsoft on Monday asked the appellate court to overturn Jackson's order in June that the company be broken into two parts. If the higher court calls for a new trial, Microsoft wants someone other than Jackson to preside.

Microsoft's brief asked the federal appeals court to find that Jackson was wrong in concluding that the software giant was an unfair monopoly, and reverse his breakup order.

"The case went awry from the outset," company spokesman Vivek Varma, said, "and our appeal provides a comprehensive picture of why Microsoft should win this case."

On Jan. 12, the government is due to file its brief with the appeals court. Microsoft will have a chance

Professor to assist in expansion of Bolivian hospital

By DALAENA NEFF
Kansas State Collegian

Using her skills as an architectural engineer is what Alison Pacheco, assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science, will be doing over her winter break.

Pacheco will be in Santa Cruz, Bolivia, Jan. 6-14 working with a team of U.S. engineers to help design an addition to an existing hospital.

Pacheco will be doing this work through Engineering Ministries International. Craig Hoffman, project development coordinator for EMI, said the program is intended to help Christian ministries provide service in developing countries.

"EMI's mission is to provide free engineering and architectural design to Christian ministries working in developing countries that are helping the poor and preaching the gospel," Hoffman said.

Pacheco said she likes to work in the engineering industry during summers to keep up with the latest advancements. During her latest work in Connecticut, she discovered EMI.

"Over the summer I love to go back into the industry, so I stay current with what I'm telling my students in the classroom," she said.

After a co-worker told Pacheco about EMI, she said she knew it was for her.

"I had been wanting to do something along those lines for a long, long time. When you think of missions work, you think of someone that preaches, and that's not really in my personality," Pacheco said. "Give me something practical to do for you. I would rather do something for you that you can't do for yourself."

After filling out the application on EMI's Web site, Pacheco started getting e-mail regarding different projects. She then found the project in Bolivia that will work with her schedule and her skills.

Pacheco's work will be on a volunteer basis. She will pay $1,500 for travel and other expenses. Her housing and transportation will be taken care of by the Bolivia Evangelical University in Santa Cruz.

Pacheco said BEU started a medical clinic to train nurses in their nursing program, help area poor people and to preach Christianity. However, BEU discovered that instead of trying to serve 500 families, they were trying to serve 20,000 families, she said.

"The need for good medical care is just tremendous," she said. "And that's why they want to add on to this hospital."

The hospital will more than triple in size when the addition is complete, she said.

A group of U.S. engineers will meet in Miami to fly to Bolivia together. Pacheco said they then will do research on the existing structure.

"We will gather as much information as we can. I anticipate I will look at the existing clinic to see what type of materials they used to build it and what kind of space we have to do the work," she said. "I've just never done anything like this before and finding out how they have done it down there before."

Pacheco said most of her work will take place once she gets back. The architect will have one month after she returns to the states to finalize the plans. Then, she will take those plans to start in on the design on the systems: the heating and air conditioning and plumbing.

There are many interesting and challenging things Pacheco is looking forward to.

"First, everything will have to be done in the metric system, and I've never done that before. Then the drawing will be converted to Spanish," she said.

Pacheco also said she wonders how a woman engineer would be viewed in Bolivia. After meeting a Bolivian engineer through her church, Pacheco said she is interested in discovering a few things about the Bolivian culture.

"The missionary I met said that they regard engineers even more highly than physicians, and that Alison Pacheco, assistant professor of architectural engineering and construction science, will be in Santa Cruz, Bolivia, over the winter break, working on an addition to an existing hospital.

he didn't know if they have ever seen a women engineer, but that I will be treated with the utmost respect," she said.

Pacheco said she is not worried about the culture change. In fact, she said she is excited to see why engineers are more highly regarded than physicians.

"I am a very adventurous, curious and inquisitive type of person," she said.

Pacheco said she does not know what to expect when she travels to South America, but she said she is anticipating the challenges.

"It will be a real challenge professionally, emotionally, mentally and physically," she said. "I've heard it's life-changing. God has put me in the position that I can do it, and I want to do it. This will be a little closer to looking at the needs of others and less looking at my own needs. It will be pushing the comfort zone—there's a strong desire to do it."

David Fritchen, head of the department of Architectural Engineering and Construction Science, said he thinks this work will be a great experience for Pacheco.

"Working on a multicultural team brings a global perspective to the engineering and education process and to her professionally," he said. "The international experience combined with her abilities as an engineer is going to serve that project well."

Hoffman said Pacheco's skills is just what they need for this project.

"She is a perfect fit for the project. She is an architectural engineer that has five to six years of experience. That's exactly what we need for this project," he said.

Kansas Legislative Intern Program gives students chance to gain experience

By SHAWN HEIN
Kansas State Collegian

One element many K-State students look to add to their résumés during their college career is an internship. The Kansas Legislative Intern Program offers just that to K-Staters who want to get experience with the political system.

The internships are nonpaid positions, but interns can earn course credit for their work in the Legislature.

An intern's primary responsibilities include assisting legislators in the House or Senate with constituent services, researching legislative issues and providing support throughout the legislative session.

"It's really a dual benefit," said John Potter, intern coordinator for the Kansas Legislature. "You get good experience and, if you really bust your butt, you can a good reference from a legislator."

Internships are available to any undergraduate, graduate or law school student attending a Kansas college or university. While no specific major is required, strong writing and communication skills are helpful.

"In the past, we've had history, English and business majors as well," Potter said. "It's unlimited to the different types of majors that can apply."

Potter said interns can request if they want to work for the House or Senate. They also can request if they would like to work for a Democratic or Republican legislator.

Linda Richter, director of internships for the Department of Political Science at K-State, said the experience an internship gives students is important.

"I always encourage people to take internships because it helps them decide what they want to do," she said.

Travis Lenkner, Student Senate chair and an intern for Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, last spring, said his internship with the Kansas legislature included a great deal of hands-on experience.

"It's a working internship," Lenkner said. "You get to do committee work with the actual Legislature."

Internship Information

■ The deadline to apply for the internships is Dec. 6. All internships begin the week of Jan. 8, 2001, and end near the final week of April.

■ Those wanting to apply should contact Linda Richter, director of internships for the Department of Political Science at K-State by e-mailing her at lrichter@ksu.edu.

Alumni should be recognized for donations

K-State's percentage of alumni who gave charitable gifts to our university has always been a highlight. We can make that into something that deserves even more recognition.

Due to their generous contributions, we receive the highest percentage of charitable gifts of any other Big 12 school. The donations from the 1999 fiscal year totaled $40 million.

These gifts usually are given in the form of cash, stocks, bonds and real estate.

Regardless of their form, they are extremely valuable to our university. Our school would be in a poor state if we did not have these generous gifts.

The KSU Foundation's Telefund is another essential element that allows students to contact alumni one-on-one.

Those donations help to improve the quality of K-State's programs. It is essential that alumni continue to donate, no matter if the performance of the football program is performing at a superior level.

Before long, we all will graduate from this university (we hope). And when the days of cheap food and financial struggles cease, we will need to continue to do what those who have graduated from here are now doing. We need to continue to donate and contribute gifts to the university that helped us obtain our dreams.

I just wanted to comment on the "102 Dalmatians." The parents' names were Dipstick and Dottie, not Pongo and Purdy — that was the funny movie. The movie was hilarious. Very funny.

Well, it's official — Bush is president. And I guess I am moving to Canada.

We need to tell the Democrats they already had a president that has been impeached but didn't lose his job. They can't have a candidate that lost the election take office.

I'm a little short on cash for a Christmas tree this year. I was just wondering if Dean Hightower had any more in his yard.

If we beat Oklahoma, Bill Snyder should be the president of K-State.

Yeah, I just heard Al Gore say he was willing to live with the results of the election. Why didn't he just concede, then?

Next time I get sick, I am going to the freaking Vet Med Center rather than Lafene.

Our founding fathers are probably turning over in their graves as we speak. The only thing Al Gore has done is make the Democratic party the laughingstock of politics. And, for the record, I am a Democrat.

To whom this may concern: I would like to thank the people who broke into our house while we were gone to enjoy this beautiful holiday on Wednesday evening. By the way, we are looking for you. We have your fingerprints. You are not going to get very far.

That guy Devis can be my official anytime.

Feb. 6, 2003

Today dawned no different than any of my previous 22 birthdays. The sunrise scorched my eyes with the same intensity this morning, making no notice of what would come.

But I felt something special would happen from the moment my alarm went off. Something more exciting than my 1996 birthday, when I spent the night in the hospital with a broken arm, doped up on Demoral.

I slowly left the cover of my flannel sheets, headed through the living room and stepped out onto the porch. A crispy layer of frost blanketed the paper and sent chills into my fingertips as I grasped it.

Twisting and pulling, I took the rubber band, flipping it into the trash can.

The headline blared from the front page, insisting direct attention. My eyes could focus only on the bold, stark type that proclaimed, "Human Genome Project Completed!"

I had known for years the project's goals. It would identify all 100,000 genes in human DNA, determine the sequences of the 3 billion chemical base pairs that make up human DNA and store the information in permanent databases.

The project also hoped to develop tools for data analysis and address the ethical, legal, and social issues (ELSI) that would arise.

Now the judgment day has come. Will the project meet its expected benefits? Will our social democracy be able to deal with downsides?

First of all, I know medicine will improve. Disease diagnosis will occur on a molecular level and rational drug designs will be prescribed. The possibility of "customized drugs" and specific gene therapy will join the list of improvements.

Forensics with complete DNA will allow better evidence analysis at crime scenes and match organ donors with recipients in transplant programs.

If society will allow, more nutritious produce, edible vaccines in food products, and more productive, disease-resistant farm animals also will be produced in the not too distant future.

However, I am scared. I realized some time ago that all humans are not created equal. Our genetics differences only will amplify the inequality.

It is impossible for everyone to be the same, but the media and common voice seems to force individuals to fill a specific mold. No genetic code is the same; therefore, no person can be exactly like any other.

How fairly will our genetic information be used? Employers, insurers, courts and schools all could discriminate with the pertinent information. Who should be able to do this? Who is to say they can't choose by

Are gene sequences and other DNA sequences to be copyrighted, patented, and kept as trade secrets? Should these sequences be commercialized? Will there be projects to create the perfect person and is such a project subject to ethical questions?

What about potential parents who want to screen their child for untreatable diseases? If they do screen, find evidence of such untreatable diseases, and choose not to have the child, what good has been done?

Whatever happened to survival of the fittest? Give me one of these diseases, but still give me a chance to live. I'll promise to be a fighter.

Same Day, Different DNA

This Feb. 6 will be like no other. People never again will celebrate this date as the middle day of winter, a day when the worst cold is halfway over. They will observe this day as the day the project was completed, be it good or bad.

As the news reached the heavens, the late Ronald Reagan celebrated his 92nd birthday, realizing that had the project been completed, there might have been a cure for his Alzheimer's disease.

Out in the "Field of Dreams," the Sultan of Swat turned 108. The late Babe Ruth might wonder if Major League Baseball will screen genetically for home run kings. He chuckled as the commissioner told Mark McGuire, "Sorry, you might have hit 70 homers, but you didn't have genetic bit XR-136Z required to be one of the best. It must have been androstenedione that made you so great."

Oblivious to history, Ad Rose awoke this morning 41 years old, still jamming "Welcome to the Jungle." Although scientists have taken his DNA, they still are searching for the bit GNR-198Z, genetic information vital to writing "November Rain."

The news awoke Alan Shepard from a dream of slicing those three balls with a six-iron on the moon some 32 years previous. Had genetic screening been around in 1971, Shepard realized he probably wouldn't have been the astronaut chosen to tee off on the lunar surface.

Queen Elizabeth II received the news on a silver platter in her royal bedroom, 51 years to the day after her father passed away and she assumed the throne. She volunteered for DNA mapping, and I patiently am awaiting her results to compare to mine. Who knows?

Genetically, I might be the Baron of K-State. Isn't the Human Genome Project great?

Will our individual genetic differences affect society's perception of us? Surely, What for those who suffer negative perceptions?

Election results final; Gore needs to quit complaining, accept defeat

What the hell is a pregnant chad?

There was a time when the words "chad" and "pregnant" were never used that close together in a sentence for any reason. That all changed one night when, during my late-night-viewing of "Seinfeld," the broadcast was interrupted for breaking news: Al Gore, the sorest of losers, has added to his demand for a hand count of votes in Florida yet another demand — a new definition of "vote." I'm not kidding.

Thus we were introduced to the pregnant and dimpled chads, and a presidential candidate who seemed to be writing up a script for a future episode ruined my night of watching the current one.

If a child loses a game and cries about it, he is told winning is not everything. If he continues, he might be sent to his room. If the whining becomes so incessant and permeating as to be almost comical, he becomes Gore.

I say "almost" comical because I fear Gore's foot stomping might yield him a victory. This is because, with each passing defeat, Gore's tactics become both more preposterous and incendiary.

Gore lost Florida, so he demanded a recount. When it looked as if he would lose that, he demanded the chad examinations. When he faced a military that really did not much like him, he decided to throw away two-thirds of the military ballots in some areas of Florida (commander-in-chief material right there). Now that defeat has been officially announced, Gore has suggested ballots once again be examined to determine if a voter possibly might have intended to vote Gore, but left the presidential check box blank.

America is responsible for the creation of the microchip, advanced atomic technology and even the glorious invention known as spandex, yet we seem unable to do something as menial as punch a hole in a piece of paper. If a person is incapable of realizing how this paper-punching thing works, perhaps we should reconsider how much involvement we want them to have in choosing our next president. Yet, ballot counters were told by superiors to account for the pregnant chad, the dimpled chad and the implied vote.

What is next? Will the magic eight ball be brought out to determine a voter's intentions? Can the gurus at the Psychic Friends Network tell us what the voters really wanted? Perhaps the magic of the tarot will unlock the truth.

Yet Gore still was announced as the loser. Thus, new forms of Gore votes must be found, and they must be found quickly. To save myself another tedious television interruption, I will supply Gore with a list of a few more ways in which people "intended" to vote for him.

First, I believe we all could agree that Ralph Nader was a more formidable vote-taker for Gore than Pat Buchanan was for Bush. As a result, K-State's old friends at the BCS should be brought in. After all, Bush might lead in the polls, but with his strength of schedule, he doesn't deserve a presidency berth.

Second, after President Clinton so soundly embarrassed America by raiding a house and sending a screaming Elian Gonzalez back to Cuba, there is little doubt the entirety of the Castro regime would vote Gore. Add to that the Buddhist monk fund-raisers from whom Gore illegally accepted funds, and two other powers now sit in the Gore camp. While it is highly irregular, Clinton/Gore worked hard to get these foreign parties on his side, and therefore they also should have a voice.

And finally, what about the Bush-chads, those ballots that people mistakenly marked for Bush? Since the intentions of these voters can't be determined with a high level of certainty, all Bush votes simply should be thrown out. This and other techniques will guarantee a fair recount.

Do I sound cynical? Perhaps I do because, while writing this column, I overheard a CNN anchor read a quote from a Singapore newspaper calling our nation a joke. They jail people for gum chewing, yet we are a joke? Thank you, Gore.

But I live in a nation where Hillary Clinton can be elected to a Senate spot with no qualifications, save a marriage to a womanizer with an oral fixation. Maybe pregnant chads are the next logical step. Then again, if all one has to do to win an election in this nation is kick and scream enough, maybe I simply will save the remainder of my college education fund, kick the gum-chewing habit and head over to Singapore.

Business college needs solution for its advisers

Editor,

I am writing this letter in regards to the current academic advising program in the College of Business Administration. In my opinion, having only four undergraduate professional advisers is inadequate to serve more than over 2,800 business students. From my perspective as a student in the College of Business and Administration and a business ambassador, I think we should have instructors and graduate teaching assistants advising freshmen and sophomores. This would allow the four professional advisers more time in their schedules to devote to upperclassmen who are looking into internships, dual majors and career opportunities.

As an incentive for faculty members and GTAs to take on this responsibility, their salaries should be increased. K-State faculty members and GTAs are at the bottom of the median salary scale among the other Big 12 schools. Each year that the college experiences a percentage increase in enrollment, they should be allocated that percentage increase in funding and faculty salaries.

I realize this is a complicated request and that rerouting money is not a simple process to implement. I just feel the K-State College of Business Administration is deserving of additional quality advisers to maintain our highly-esteemed national reputation. After all, according to Stan Elsea, associate dean of the College of Business Administration, the College of Business Administration is the third largest college on campus, and we have experienced a 41 percent increase in enrollment since 1995.

To keep growing and prospering, hiring more advisers is essential to assure business students that they are receiving top quality advice that will prepare them for a career in the business world. According to the K-State College of Agriculture Student Handbook and College of Agriculture Primer, there are 104 academic advisers for 2,022 undergraduates and 400 graduate students. Most of these advisers have been between 25-45 students to advise. The four advisers in the College of Business Administration are advising between 600 and 800 students each.

There are many advantages to having faculty advise students. Because the faculty actually are teaching classes, they know the students' learning styles and what they are capable of handling. They know how many hours to recommend a student take as well as what kinds of classes they think they would perform well in and enjoy. Students would be able to develop more personal relationships with their faculty adviser because they would have more time to allot each advice. Students will feel more comfortable talking about their curriculum and future plans with someone who knows them on an intimate basis.

Graduate teaching assistants also are qualified to advise undergrads. The GTAs are hand-picked by the department heads not only because they are the very best and brightest students, but because they are natural leaders. Since they have taken first- and second-year courses within the last five years, they are well-equipped to recommend classes that are relevant to the students they would be advising.

My purpose in writing this letter is not to ruffle feathers or stir up trouble. I realize this is not an easy situation to remedy, but I just want you to see the advising problem in the College of Business Administration. It would be a shame to let its reputation deteriorate simply because students feel like they merely are a number to their adviser.

Amount of sleep can have effect on performance in classes, tests

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

Getting good grades and doing well on tests might be related to how much sleep students receive each night, said Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene Health Center.

"If it's a choice to only sleep four hours a night, they will be susceptible to getting poorer grades," Kennedy said. "There is also a possibility of hurting the learning process a lot more than if they got a good night's sleep."

Kennedy said humans need an average of six to 10 hours of sleep each night. The reality, however, is many college students, especially during periods of high workloads at school, are not getting enough sleep.

With finals approaching, some students are finding themselves with more homework and studying than they have time for. By interrupting their sleep patterns, Kennedy said these students could end up doing worse on their assignments.

Memory and recall are two of the main functions that are affected by sleep, Kennedy said. Pulling an all-nighter can actually result in a lower grade than if the student studied for as much as time permitted and received the amount of sleep necessary for adequate cognitive functioning.

"Sometimes it's better to sleep and rely on memory to recall what you already know," Kennedy said.

Nevertheless, a number of college students can't seem to avoid all-nighters.

Amy Mauk, senior in family life and community service, said she will never forget her first all-nighter. It occurred the night before an 8:30 a.m. exam that she said she hadn't planned enough for.

"I decided I'd just stay up," she

"People think that if they sleep in on the weekends, they can make up for the sleep missed during the week. But you can't make up for sleep. It's already time passed, and you don't know what you haven't learned."

— Carol Kennedy, director of health education and promotion at Lafene said. "The next morning when my teacher started handing out all the Scantrons, I just started laughing uncontrollably."

That was during Mauk's freshman year. She has made a pact with herself that if she still is studying at 2 a.m., she will stop and go to bed. However, there are times when she must break her own rule.

"You can try to plan all you want, but sometimes it just doesn't happen," she said.

The problems begin when the all-nighter becomes a necessity, Kennedy said.

The body goes through four stages of sleep throughout the night, ending in rapid eye movement (REM) sleep. Studies show that REM sleep is what is necessary for learning. It is during this sleep that the brain organizes thoughts.

Some activities in which students participate can disable them from reaching REM sleep.

These activities include drinking alcohol or caffeine and exercising prior to falling asleep.

T-cells, which are important in maintaining a body's immune system, also are affected by a lack of sleep, Kennedy said. This can cause a person to be more susceptible to illness.

"There is a reason the body needs sleep," Kennedy said. "Time management is critical."

Jana Slattery, senior in business marketing, deals with time management daily. She works from 10 p.m. to 6:30 a.m. at Wal-Mart four nights a week, but doesn't let this stop her from getting her school work done and still maintaining an average of five hours of sleep each night.

"I know what I have to do, and I get it done before I go to work," she said.

Kennedy said sleep deprivation can lead to both physical and psychological long-term problems.

"The body and the mind are so closely connected that one may become depressed, eat more or eat less," Kennedy said. "This could result in poor nutrition on overall health."

Warning signs of sleep deprivation include falling asleep in class, craving sleep and irritability, Kennedy said. She said allotting adequate time for sleep, even if this disrupts a student's studying schedule, is the first step to avoiding long-term problems.

"People think that if they sleep in on the weekends, they can make up for the sleep missed during the week," she said. "But you can't make up for sleep. It's already time passed, and you don't know what you haven't learned."

Muslims celebrate holy month of Ramadan with fasting and prayer

By JOHN BENTLEY
Associated Press

CAIRO, Egypt — The mood was both festive and contemplative as Muslims began their holiest month Monday, lighting special lanterns, watching holiday TV programs and enjoying special meals to mark the end of daily fasting.

During Ramadan — which lasts 28 days — observant Muslims abstain from eating, drinking, smoking, and sexual intercourse between sunrise and sunset to spiritually renew themselves. The month commemorates when the Quran, the Muslim holy book, was revealed to the Prophet Muhammad about 1,400 years ago.

It also is a time of festivity as Muslims indulge in special foods, entertainment and cultural traditions. In Egypt, Jordan and other countries in the Middle East, benefactors provide millions of free meals to the poor, while in Kuwait, children dress in traditional costumes and go door-to-door singing religious songs in return for nuts and candy.

"Ramadan is a special time for food, for prayer, for meeting friends, for everything," said Ahmed Abu Ela of Cairo.

As the first day of fasting wound down in the Egyptian capital, traffic came to a halt in the hours leading up to iftar, or breakfast, as people whose nerves were frayed by lack of food — and more often than not, cigarettes — frantically tried to get home.

By the time the mosques announced the sunset prayer and a cannon at Saladin's citadel fired a round to proclaim the end of the day's fast, millions of the nation's less fortunate had gathered to eat free iftar meals provided by rich benefactors, mosques and other charities.

In Egypt, an estimated 6 million people — or 10 percent of the population — frequent such tables. In Iraq, an even higher percentage of the population is expected to rely on free meals, as millions suffer from food shortages caused by a decade of U.N. economic sanctions imposed after Iraq's invasion of Kuwait.

At the other end of the scale, five-star hotels offer sumptuous iftar buffets and multicourse meals as well as live music and other entertainment until dawn.

After the fast is broken, streets throughout the Middle East fill up as people head out to shop, eat, pray or gather with friends for a game of backgammon at a coffee shop. Many people stay out until 2 or 3 a.m.

TEAM BUILDING

Men's basketball players learning to work together

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Jim Wooldridge's philosophy is much like Bill Cosby's when he filmed commercials for Jell-O — the proof is in the pudding.

After losing to Wichita State 66-76 Nov. 21 and suffering from several of the same problems that haunted the Cats in their two exhibition losses, namely their opponents' three-point shooting and the Cats' lack of an inside scoring threat, head coach Wooldridge said he believes his team is starting to learn from its mistakes.

"I think our team, going to Wichita State, playing in that game, and the results of it, and the film work we did from that game have helped them understand a little better about who they are," he said, "and what they have to do to be a better team and what they have to do individually to help the team be better."

"Of course, the proof will be in the pudding. We'll see as we move along here. It's all part of the process we're going through."

That process, one of learning the capabilities of each player, is an inherent part of a team that has a new coaching staff and several new players, Wooldridge said.

"It's very difficult in the early part of the season to reach your identity as a team and perform at a high level without going through what we're going through right now," he said. "We're learning who these players are and we're learning what their roles are. If you throw all that together, what we're doing is going through a process."

"We're laying down a foundation for our program and the future of it, and we're learning how to play how we want our guys to play."

Despite the challenges every team must face during a season, the loss to Wichita State was still frustrating. The Cats hope to reverse that feeling tonight against Tennessee State, center Kelvin Howell said Monday afternoon.

"It was kind of depressing to lose, not saying that Wichita State is a bad team to lose to, but it was hard-fought for. We came back and prepared and worked hard over the break. We're getting things done and getting ready for tomorrow," he said. "It'd be just a major letdown not to walk down there and not put what we've done in practice on the floor."

What the Cats have been doing in practice is fixing their mistakes from the previous games. For instance, the offensive play from inside the paint has been lacking, especially at Wichita State, Howell said.

"We did a lot of standing around, so we've been working on moving without the ball and moving towards the ball to help our team out in the zone defense," he said.

On defense, opponents have been lighting the Cats up from the three-point line, and they have been working on getting out on the shooter faster, Wooldridge said.

"We've got two small guards, and I think players have got to understand that when a player has found a hot hand, you've got to get to him quicker," he said. "Be more aggressive, deny him when you can, and you should do a better job of recognizing the shooter."

Being smaller than the opponent is no excuse for not playing well, however, forward Travis Reynolds said.

"That just makes them have to work harder. Playing against big guards, that just means that they're going have get out and contest the shot," he said. "They're probably going to be quicker than most guards, so they're going get out and make them put in to the floor."

Despite practicing those fundamentals on offense and defense, how quickly the team rectifies its wrongs still remains to be seen, Wooldridge said.

"It can only happen as fast as these basketball players on this team will allow it to, and that is the unknown," he said. "Are they going to get better? We're going to drive them, we're going to work them to, but how quick that happens, I don't know."

K-State recruits athletes for upcoming seasons

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head track and field coach Cliff Rovelto announced Nov. 20 the signing of six athletes to national letters of intent.

Chayton Hill, Kendra Wecker, Brie Madden, Erik Sproll, Trisha Culbertson and Lisa Beachler all inked with K-State. The six are the first members of Rovelto's 2001-02 recruiting class.

"We are very excited about the addition of this fine group of athletes to our program at Kansas State University," Rovelto said.

• Hill, of Converse Judson (Texas) High School, is a three-time runner-up in the triple jump at the 5A Texas State High School meet and holds the school record with a leap of 41-9.

The Kirby, Texas, native is a three-time district and regional triple jump champion, while also recording personal bests of 5 feet, 8 inches in the high jump and 18 feet, 2 inches in the long jump.

• Wecker, a US Olympic Trials participant, also will play basketball at K-State under head coach Deb Patterson. The Marysville, Kan., native is the reigning Kansas Class 4A state javelin champion and has the U.S. junior national record with a mark of 174 feet, 6 inches.

She is ranked the No. 1 high school javelin track athlete as well as a javelin All-American by Track and Field News.

• Madden will join Wecker on the women's basketball team next season, in addition to competing in the high jump for Rovelto. Madden was the 2000 Texas 5A state high jump champion at Mansfield High School, boasting a personal best of 5 feet, 11 inches.

"Chaytan, Kendra and Brie are all top ranked juniors in the United States in their primary events, the triple jump, javelin and high jump, respectively," Rovelto said.

• Sproll, who will come to K-State from Winnipeg, Manitoba, Canada, is the 2000 Canadian Junior national champion in the 800 meters. He also won both the 400 and 800 meters in the Canadian National Legion championship in the 17 and under age group.

In the 1999 World Youth Games, Sproll took seventh in the 800 meters. He also vaults personal bests of 48.48 in the 400 and 1:50.61 in the 800.

Players sign to join 2002 baseball team

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

Head baseball coach Mike Clark announced Nov. 21 the signing of three baseball players to national letters of intent.

High school seniors Jerad Head and Chris Lopez, as well as community college player Ryan Baldwin, all signed to play for K-State beginning in the 2002 season.

"We're really happy with the three individuals we signed in the early period," Clark said. "All three players are quality athletes and address needs we have in the coming years. We look forward to helping these young men have outstanding careers here at Kansas State."

Yates, Pierce earn conference honors from league office

Defensive back Derrick Yates was named Big 12 Defensive Newcomer of the Year, while linebacker Terry Pierce was selected as the conference's Defensive Freshman of the Year, the league office announced Saturday.

Yates, a junior from Houston, Texas, filled in at safety this season, notching 28 tackles, including 21 solo stops, and six pass break-ups in helping the Cats earn a No. 7 national ranking in pass efficiency defense.

Meanwhile, Pierce, a redshirt freshman from Fort Worth, Texas, is ninth on K-State's tackle chart with 38. He has six tackles for losses, an interception and a fumble recovery this season.

3 Cat seniors selected as Football News All-Americans

A trio of K-State seniors have been named to the Football News All-America first-team squad, the magazine announced last Wednesday.

Wide receiver Quincy Morgan, defensive lineman Mario Fatafehi and kicker Jamie Rheem were all first-team selections. K-State and Florida State were the only schools with three picks on the first team.

The entire list will be announced in the Dec. 9 issue of Football News, which went to press Sunday.

In addition, Morgan, Fatafehi and Rheem also were named to the Football News All-Big 12 Conference team, which will be listed in the same issue.

Football players honored by Big 12 Conference coaches

Several Wildcats were featured on the fifth All-Big 12 Conference Coaches Football Team, which was released Friday.

To wit:

First team offense: Offensive line: senior center Randall Cummins; Wide receiver: senior Quincy Morgan; Placekicker: senior Jamie Rheem; Punt Returner: junior Aaron Lockett.

First team defense: Interior line: senior defensive tackle Mario Fatafehi; Defensive back: junior cornerback Jerametrius Butler.

Second team offense: Offensive line: senior tackle Milford Stephenson.

Second team defense: End/outside linebacker: senior defensive end Monty Beisel; Linebacker: junior Ben Leber; Defensive Back: senior cornerback Dyshod Carter.

Third team offense: Quarterback: senior Jonathan Beasley; Running Back: junior Josh Scobey.

Third team defense: End/outside linebacker: senior defensive end Chris Johnson.

Honorable mention: Defensive back: junior strong safety Jon McGraw.

Lockett, Johnson named Big 12 Players of the Week

Senior defensive end Chris Johnson and junior Aaron Lockett were named the SBC Big 12 Conference Football Defensive and Special Teams Players of the Week, respectively, on Nov. 21 for games played Nov. 18.

Johnson set a school record with four sacks for minus-25 yards to lead K-State to a 28-24 victory over Missouri.

Meanwhile, Lockett claimed his third conference Special Teams Player of the Week honor after returning two punts for 59 yards against the Tigers. Lockett ranks second in the nation in punt returns with a 21.6 average on 20 runbacks.

3 Cats selected to All-Big 12 Conference Volleyball Team

Senior middle blocker Kelle Branting, junior outside hitter Liz Wegner and junior setter Disney Bronnenberg were three of only 21 athletes recognized by the 2000 Big 12 Coaches this season, the conference office released late Sunday evening.

Branting and Wegner both were selected to the 12-member first team by the league coaches, while Bronnenberg was one of six athletes receiving honorable mention.

K-State has had at least two players on the all-conference first team for the past three seasons.

5 K-State players named to Academic All-Big 12 team

Senior Kelle Branting, juniors Jayne Christen and Lisa Mimick, and sophomore Jenny Pollard all were selected to the Volleyball Academic All-Big 12 team, the league office announced Nov. 21.

Meanwhile, junior Liz Wegner was chosen to the second team.

"We talk a lot about what it takes to be a true winner in athletics," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "That includes commitment and sacrifice both on and off the court. It is an all-time thing."

"These five individuals really exemplify what it means to be a student-athlete here at Kansas State University and in the Big 12 Conference."

To qualify, student athletes must maintain a 3.0 grade point average or higher, either cumulative or the previous two semesters, and must have participated in 60 percent of his/her team's scheduled contests. First-team members must maintain at least a 3.2 GPA.

Wegner chosen as Big 12 volleyball athlete of week

Junior outside hitter Liz Wegner was named the Big 12 Conference Volleyball Athlete of the Week by the conference office Nov. 21.

Wegner received the honor after totaling back-to-back double-doubles (kills-digs) in the Wildcats' three-game sweeps of both Oklahoma and Colorado.

"Liz is finally getting the recognition she has deserved all season," head coach Jim McLaughlin said. "Time and time again, she has led this team both physically and mentally in key situations. She is proving to be not only one of the Big 12's best outside hitters, but also one of the nation's best."

"And the scary thing is that she continues to get better and better each match."

Team prepared for win against No. 1 Oklahoma

I want to just say it. It's right on the tip of my tongue. I know pretty much without a doubt that these feelings are true and will happen. But... I'm afraid.

I'm afraid of the consequences of declaring right now that the Wildcats will beat the Sooners this weekend in Kansas City, Mo., and win the school's first Big 12 Conference championship. You might feel the same way.

And why not? The Wildcats have been playing outstanding football of late. The midseason jitters seem to be behind them, and considering how they played against then-No. 4 Nebraska, they look as if they have the talent and composure to beat any team in the nation.

Add to that Oklahoma's lackluster performances against Texas Tech and Okie State and it wouldn't be beyond the stretch of anyone's imagination to go to Vegas with your holiday money and bet it all on the Cats.

But don't book your plane tickets to Tempe, Ariz., for the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl just yet. Hold on to your wallet and consider the facts.

First of all, I, too, believe the Wildcats will win, but I'm not going to say it too loudly. Pretty much every prediction I've had so far this football season seems to not come true.

I predicted that K-State vs. Nebraska would be the most important game of the season. You probably remember. But, nope, the Oklahoma game turned out to be much more significant.

I also said K-State would rebound from the Oklahoma game, beat Texas A&M and come close to securing an Orange Bowl bid. Well, we all know how that one turned out.

In short, this season has been entirely unpredictable. There's no real way to forecast what exactly is going to happen on Saturday. K-State was supposed to beat Oklahoma the first time. They didn't.

Oklahoma was supposed to beat Oklahoma State badly. They didn't. Colorado was supposed to have a stellar season. They didn't.

College football teams have had a knack of proving the professional analysts and preseason magazines wrong this season. Nothing has really gone the way it was supposed to. So this time, I'm going to try and keep my mouth shut and let the teams play it out on the gridiron.

But that reason is not the most important one for K-Staters to shed any cocky attitudes they might have before the showdown in KC.

With K-State's resurgence in the polls and Oklahoma's un-No. 1-like play, some media members and fans are saying that K-State will beat Oklahoma. Preliminary reports suggest that the spread will be less than four points in favor of the Sooners.

Unfortunately, this isn't what K-State fans want. Oklahoma needs to think that they're going to win and win big. Let me explain.

During the Sooners' unbelievable season, they have played better, if not near perfectly, when the odds are against them. That's just the kind of team they are. They play well when nobody thinks they will.

Most predictors said they wouldn't escape the season with any less than three wins. Now they're undefeated. Everyone assumed they would lose to Texas. They throttled them. They probably would lose to K-State in Manhattan, right? Wrong. And of course, many thought Nebraska was going to beat them. Didn't happen.

But when they were supposed to win big — they didn't. Hence, the Sooners' performance against the Cowboys, Aggies and Red Raiders.

So, if you think the Wildcats will upset the Sooners at Arrowhead Stadium this weekend, keep it on the d-low. Don't tell anyone. I sure won't.

"Erik is an extremely talented youngster who has benefited from parents who ran and have given him great guidance," Rovelto said. "He has competed at a high level and has international as well as national experience."

• Culbertson, of Burlington, Kan., will run distance and cross country for K-State. In high school, she finished third in the 3,200 meters at the Kansas Class 4A state meet, while boasting a personal best of 11:29.22 in the event.

• Beachler is not only a two-time

Class A state champion in the shot put while at Oakland Craig (Neb.) High School, but also is a maintains a state title in the discus. Her personal bests include 46 feet, 9 inches in the shot put and 137 feet in the discus. "Lisa is an outstanding athlete who we think will develop into a national caliber thrower very quickly," Rovelto said.

BASEBALL

• Head, a 6-foot-1, 185-pound pitcher and infielder, was the state's batting leader last season at Hayden High School with a .603 average and six home runs, while posting a 5-1 record on the mound with a 3.20 ERA.

The Topeka native is the grandson of legendary Wildcat basketball standout Ed Head, who starred on the K-State basketball team that finished second to Kentucky in the 1951 national championship game.

• Lopez, a 6-foot, 180-pound middle infielder, is new to the state of Kansas.

The junior will begin his first full season at Dodge City High School this spring after transferring in June from Iron Woods High School in Iron Woods, Ariz.

Despite an injury-plagued junior campaign last season, Lopez posted a .500 batting average with 17 RBI, seven doubles and one home run.

• Baldwin, a 5-foot-11, 185-pound catcher, is set to begin his second season at Connors State College in Warner, Okla., this spring.

The Tulsa, Okla., native helped the Cowboys to a 45-15 overall record in 2000 and a No. 12 final ranking in the NJCAA poll.

A graduate of Hale High School in Tulsa, Baldwin posted a .451 batting average with 45 RBI, six home runs and 12 stolen bases in 1999 as a senior en route to earning all-region, all-Metro and all-conference honors.

certification of Bush as winner of Florida's 25 electoral votes found that six in 10 Americans say it is time for Gore to concede. The survey, by ABC News-Washington Post, also found that about six in 10 say they would accept Gore as legitimately elected if he were to emerge as the president.

While legal maneuvering churned in Florida and loomed in Washington, Bush met with Andy Card, the man he picked as White House chief of staff. Card said Bush is getting ready to be a great president.

The Clinton administration wasn't following the Bush script, refusing to release $5.3 million set aside for the presidential transition.

Running mate Dick Cheney said Bush would finance his own transition operation with private contributions.

He said it would be irresponsible if Bush did not move as quickly as possible, given the delay.

Some analysts say Bush's camp acted prematurely.

"What's real important here is not to fall into the trap of the permanent campaign, of thinking strictly in terms of public relations and spin and the game," Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution said. "This is much too serious a matter."

"I understand that game is going on, but the message you're getting from me is that what's much more important here is what's unfolding in the courts — the Supreme Court at the request of Governor Bush and in the Florida courts primarily at the initiative of Vice President Gore. That's where the action is."

and fouls, and new three-sided clocks above each basket will show both the game and shot clocks.

All in all, the effect should be one to remember, said Steve Mammola, director of marketing and corporate relations.

"We're going for the effect that people would walk in and say, 'Wow, I can't believe this is the same place I walked into eight months ago,'" he said.

The renovations also should assist in drawing recruits to both K-State's men's and women's basketball programs, Mammola said.

"Recruits come to places where they feel like there's a focus on their particular sport," Mammola said. "We want them to walk in and say, 'Wow, they take basketball seriously at K-State.'" tion to a problem in a positive way, it's a good thing," she said. "It's a wonderful feeling."

Last year, the breadbasket raised a total of $204,000. Bramhall said she hopes to accomplish this again, but is unsure.

"I don't know that this year we'll be that fortunate," she said. "I've been watching the trends and the malls don't seem quite as full this year."

Still, Bramhall said she is optimistic.

"If it can be done, it will be done in Manhattan, Kansas," she said.

Bush settles into role

By TOM RAUM
The Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas — George W. Bush is on track in planning a new government, one that would include Democrats in key positions, aides suggested Tuesday. Still, continuing legal clouds subdued some of Bush's optimism.

"We are now in uncharted waters," Bush spokeswoman Karen Hughes said. "We're in an unprecedented period where a presidential candidate is going to court essentially to try to contest and overturn the results of an election that has now been certified."

She told reporters during an afternoon briefing at campaign headquarters that Bush continues to ask he not be called president elect because of the current court challenges by Democratic rival Al Gore.

"The governor has asked us all to be humble and to be gracious," she said.

"We are mindful of the fact that the vice president ... a little more than an hour ago reiterated that he is continuing in court to challenge the legitimate outcome of the election," she said after Gore discussed his continuing battle in a nationally televised appearance.

Bush also visited the headquarters Tuesday but steered clear of a roomful of reporters who came to attend the Hughes briefing. Instead, he greeted campaign staff members and volunteers.

Bush then prepared to spend the next few days on his ranch in Crawford, about a two-hour drive north of here. Since Election Day, Bush has divided his time between the governor's mansion here and the secluded 1,500-acre ranch.

Running mate Dick Cheney, who is overseeing transition planning, was to join in at the ranch later in the week.

"They will be discussing transition efforts," Ari Fleischer, Bush's transition spokesman, said.

But Bush aides said it appears unlikely that Bush will name any prospective Cabinet appointments before the Supreme Court has a chance to hear the case Friday.

Colin Powell, Bush's known choice to be secretary of state, was reluctant to participate in any such announcement while so many legal issues remain to be resolved, aides said.

Still, Bush pressed ahead in planning behind the scenes for a transition to power, meeting on Tuesday first at his residence and later at his state capitol office with Andrew Card, his prospective White House chief of staff.

Card later told reporters that the two discussed prospective appointments — and that some candidates for top Bush jobs might be brought to Texas later this week.

Asked about whether Bush could meet a 'Gameday' to telecast Big 12 battle

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

"College Gameday" will make its first telecast at a Big 12 Championship game this Saturday, ESPN announced Tuesday.

Host Chris Fowler and analysts Lee Corso and Kirk Herbstreit will broadcast live from Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo., the site of the conference title game pitting No. 7 K-State against No. 1 Oklahoma.

"Gameday" is scheduled to begin its hour-long show at 10 a.m.

The telecast will originate from Arrowhead's D Lot, on the southeast corner of the stadium. Gates 1 and 2 will be opened at 8:30 a.m., giving college football fans an opportunity to be part of the "Gameday" audience.

Since 1993, "Gameday" has traveled across the country to the nation's top games. K-State holds the "Gameday" unofficial live audience record, which the Wildcats' set this season, as 15,587 fans were present at KSU Stadium on Oct. 14 prior to the K-State/Oklahoma game.

Blue Key honors campus leaders

■ Horticulture Club adviser awarded top honor at event attended by more than 160.

Kansas State Collegian

More than 160 K-State students and faculty members were recognized at the 2000 Leadership Symposium sponsored by Blue Key Senior Honorary Tuesday night in the Union Main Ballroom.

"Behind the Scenes: Serving KSU," was the theme of this year's event honoring K-State leaders.

Paul Jennings, Horticulture Club adviser, was awarded the top honor for a faculty adviser with the Adviser of the Year award.

"This is a good way to recognize lots of behind the scenes leaders," Julie York, junior in elementary education, said. "It's great to recognize people who sometimes aren't recognized for the wonderful things they do to make our school a better place."

Students who attended the event were nominated by the organization they belong to. Casey Clark, co-chair of the symposium and a senior in biology, said the student groups were asked to nominate two members from their organizations. Organizations nominated members based on leadership behind the scenes and servant leadership.

"There are a lot of students in organizations on campus who put forth the effort but do not receive the recognition for the work they do," Clark said. "This event gives some of the leaders on campus and opportunity to be recognized."

Julie Beggs served as the keynote speaker for the symposium. Beggs travels the country speaking on service and leadership. During the symposium she talked about personal stories involving leadership as well as serving and leading with distinction.

"Service and leadership is about human behavior," Beggs said. "We need a whole lot more of leaders to make this world a better place."

Some saw the event as a celebration in honor of students and faculty members who give endless amounts of time and energy to serve and help others.

"This is a celebration recognizing those who don't get recognized," Emily Belton, co-chair of the event and senior in bakery science and management, said.

This year more than 40 organizations sent representatives to the Leadership Symposium and this year was the first time the event combined both students and faculty. Belton said she hopes the event grows bigger each year to recognize those on campus who excel in leadership.

"It is an incredible opportunity for student leaders and advisors who normally go unrecognized to receive their due credit," said Phil Stein, senior in political science and pre-law.

Helen Gough, Fort Riley's deputy garrison commander, manages support functions such as housing, social activities and transportation. Gough has had this position for the past five years.

Working up Alumna holds highest Army civilian position

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Helen Gough's bachelor's degree from K-State helped her acquire a position at Fort Riley's library 28 years ago. Her work ethic then earned her the Army's highest civilian position.

"There are some people out there that feel when they get a job it's the Army's responsibility to promote them," Gough said. "Some people try to let the system take care of their career."

Much of Gough's early experience included improving her education and helping raise her family. She earned her master's degree in industrial engineering and was in the Army's public works department for 16 years.

Gough has been Fort Riley's deputy garrison commander for five years. She manages support functions such as maintenance, transportation, personnel, housing, parks and social activities.

The civilian work force in the Army provides supplies and maintains equipment, practice sites, infrastructure, phones and computers. Gough said military personnel are able to focus on tactical missions while civilians help them prepare for war.

Kent Thomas was the garrison commander prior to Gough's placement in the position. He said her achievements in a male-dominated environment are a credit to her personality.

"This is a lady that started out working in the library — then works her way up in an area that was predominately male," he said.

Gough said there are some challenges as a female in her field. Some women might feel they are disadvantaged, but she has never been concerned with sex discrimination.

"I have a hard time empathizing with women who think that gender is an issue," she said. "It's never bothered me to go on a work site with a guy or go talk to them."

"I don't see many road blocks."

There are still some career fields in the Army where Gough said women are not permitted and some civilians might find promotion difficult. She said Fort Riley, though, has few limitations, which has enabled her to set and accomplish her goals.

In her nearly 30-year career, Gough said many women have been reaching senior positions. Women in leadership positions were rare when she first started working at Fort Riley.

"I've seen more acceptance as equals — due to culture and values," she said. "It's a natural evolution."

Thomas said Gough emerged in the Army when capable female employees were being sought. He said limitations in the civilian work force now are almost nonexistent.

"There are all kinds of opportunities out there for capable people," he said. "I don't think she ever let herself feel victimized."

Gough said traditional gender roles should be disregarded in order to be successful. Women and men, she said, should be able to operate in uncomfortable conditions.

It's important, Gough said, to adjust to new situations and work with different people. She said men need to learn to be more compassionate, and women need to learn to deal with their frustrations constructively.

"What I want to do is be a role model for men and women," she said. "I think both bring strength to the table."

K-State graduate Julie Poyser worked with Gough as an intern for three years. Poyser said she thinks the Army is a good career path for women. There were no apparent obstacles for females in her experience from 1989 to 1992.

Poyser said her position as an engineering division chief would not have been reached without Gough's influence.

"She's been my personal mentor," Poyser said. "I don't think I would have had the success I have now if not for her."

This is Part One of a three-part series taking an in-depth look at women's roles in local military.

CSU investigates alleged use of date-rape drug

FORT COLLINS, Colo. — Colorado State University officials are investigating the Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity after five women said they were given date-rape drugs while attending parties at the house this fall.

The investigation does not include reports of sexual assault, according to officials of the CSU Judicial Affairs office.

CSU began investigating the allegations after witnesses said date-rape drugs were present at a Sept. 30 party. Authorities said the three most popular date-rape drugs are GHB, Rohypnol and Ketamine, sedatives that are odorless, tasteless and mix nearly perfectly into liquids.

The night of the party, a female student who had attended the party was transported from her residence hall to Poudre Valley Hospital. CSU police reports said she was vomiting and possibly hallucinating.

The police case later was closed at the student's request.

But as the CSU judicial investigation continued, seven complaints were filed. Five of the complaints were from students who said they had been drugged; the other two were from students who said they knew date-rape drugs were used at the party.

CSU Director of Judicial Affairs Anne Hudgens said the school forwarded the complaints to Fort Collins police two weeks ago.

Hudgens said no individuals were named in the allegations, and CSU authorities are investigating the fraternity as a whole.

Another recall issued for Ford Escape drivers

DETROIT — For the fifth time in a little over a year, Ford Motor Co. told its dealers to stop selling its new Escape sport utility vehicles while they're checked for safety-related problems.

The latest notice to dealers was sent Nov. 18, affecting 51,022 Escapes and about 24,000 Mazda Tributes, which share basic parts with the Escape and are built in the same plant in Claycomo, Mo. Of those, 27,516 Escapes and about 12,500 Tributes already have been sold.

Ford spokesman Mike Vaughn said dealers were told to check for damaged windshield wiper link ball sockets and replace them if necessary. If the sockets were improperly built, the wipers could stop working. Parts to fix the problem are in the pipeline to dealers, Vaughn said.

Previous warnings to dealers on the Escape and Tribute, both of which only went on the market in August, have included warnings about the steering wheel coming off, leaky fuel lines, incorrect wheel hubs and a problem with the cruise control that could cause the throttle to stick.

Vaughn said this was the first Escape notice that had involved a large number of vehicles already sold to consumers. He said the windshield wiper problem was found through warranty claims, and that Ford expects about 6 percent of Escapes to be affected.

Ford has seen its share of high-profile recalls this year, with the recall of 6.5 million Firestone tires on Ford trucks leading the list. The company also announced in April that it would pay for failing head gaskets on about one million 3.8-liter V6 engines built in the early to mid-1990s.

Ford executives have said recalls are acceptable to the company as a way of improving customer relations, a prime directive of Ford CEO Jac Nasser.

Study suggests women, men listen differently

CHICAGO — Score one for exasperated women: New research suggests men really do listen with just half their brains.

In a study of 20 men and 20 women, brain scans showed that men, when listening, mostly used the left sides of their brains, the region long associated with understanding language. Women in the study, however, used both sides.

Other studies have suggested that women can handle listening to two conversations at once, said Dr. Joseph T. Lurito, an assistant radiology professor at the Indiana University School of Medicine. "One of the reasons may be that they have more brain devoted to it."

Lurito's findings, presented Tuesday at the Radiological Society of North America's annual meeting, don't necessarily mean women are better listeners.

It could be that it's harder for them, Lurito suggested, since they apparently need to use more of their brains than men to do the same task.

"I don't want a battle of the sexes," he said. "I just want people to realize that men and women may process language differently."

In the study, functional magnetic resonance imaging — or fMRI — was used to measure brain activity by producing multi-dimensional images of blood flow to various parts of the brain.

Inside an MRI scanner, study participants wore headphones and listened to taped excerpts from John Grisham's novel "The Partner" while researchers watched blood-flow images of their brains, displayed on a nearby video screen.

Listening resulted in increased blood flow in the left temporal lobes of the men's brains. In women, both temporal lobes showed activity.

The findings tend to support previous suggestions that women's brains are either more bilaterally dominant or more right-side dominant in doing certain tasks than men's, said Dr. Edgar Kenton of the American Stroke Association, a neurologist at Thomas Jefferson University in Philadelphia.

Though preliminary, the study could help doctors treating stroke victims better understand how men's and women's brains differ, Kenton said.

It suggests that in a stroke affecting the brain's left side, women might recover language ability more quickly than men, though that remains to be proven, Kenton said.

Director of Breadbasket started as volunteer

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Shirley Bramhall, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, oversees the organization and its various boards, coordinates client services, ensures accountability and makes sure that the environment is pleasant for volunteers.

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

When the children of Shirley Bramhall, director of Flint Hills Breadbasket, were in their teens, she noticed something about some of her daughter's friends.

What she noticed was that some of them were pregnant and did not have anywhere to turn for help.

"I thought, 'There's got to be something out there that grabs these youngsters and helps put them on track,'" Bramhall said. "I wanted to do something. I didn't just want to sit here and talk about it."

She then talked to Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, and he directed her to the Flint Hills Breadbasket. That is where her involvement began. She began volunteering, and soon after, the director at the time retired. Bramhall was asked to take over the position.

"I thought, 'Oh my goodness, this isn't something I planned on,'" she said. "Even though it's paid as a part-time job, it's not a part-time job. It's full-time, 24-7."

After throwing around the idea for a while, she accepted.

"So here I am, 10 years later," she said.

Now, she does much more than she did as a volunteer. On a day-to-day basis, she oversees the organization and its various boards, coordinates client services, ensures accountability and makes sure the environment is pleasant for volunteers.

On top of that, she takes care of administrative duties, such as bookkeeping, fund raising and educating.

"It's really rewarding," Bramhall said. "I've never had a job where I could help so many people with so many things."

The greatest thing she can help people do is to become self-sufficient, she said.

"That's the best gift you can give anyone," she said.

When that does happen, the response from her clients is what drives her to continue.

"That's why I hang in there," she said. "There are so many wonderful things that happen. It's so rewarding, and that's why I come back day after day."

Many times, Bramhall said, what people need merely is encouragement.

"Sometimes it's just helping them realize they can do better than just $5.50 an hour," she said.

In 1999, she said they had 11,970 clients. Some came in once, and some continue to come. Seeing so many clients, she said the hardest part was seeing the ones she could not help.

"It's watching people come in that need something that's frankly not available," she said.

People needing higher education is one of these things. Clients who have children, a job and restricted resources often cannot afford the money or time to go back to school.

Society often does not help these people, she said, which makes her job harder.

"If you're down, you're down, and that's hard to watch," Bramhall said. "We try to let them see the light at the end of the tunnel, and if not, another train."

What people can do with the resources they do have is amazing, she said, many times it's just helping the people realize that.

Dan Parcel, assistant to the director, said how Bramhall handles her clients is amazing.

"It's really obvious she cares a great deal for her clients. She really listens to them like no one else maybe would," he said. "I really admire her for that."

During the holidays, the Breadbasket becomes very busy, and so does Bramhall's job. One task she takes on is placing clients with donors through the Adopt-a-Family Program. Donors give money to the organization that is used to purchase Christmas presents for families that cannot afford them.

Reading what some of the children wish to have for Christmas, such as a bed, or relief of their parents' bills, brings tears to her eyes, she said.

"These are the things that really break my heart. I think, 'We can do this. We can find a way,'" Bramhall said.

Though it is hard, she said it has given her a greater appreciation for what she has.

"It gives me the opportunity to respect a lot of things I have, and to be so grateful, and to help others be grateful," she said.

Putting in extra time and emotion during these times have allowed her to experience what she said is a true Christmas — giving, and giving from the heart.

"What a thing to do," Bramhall said, "And I love it."

Her greatest accomplishment, she said, would be to one day not have so much work to do.

"It would be to one day stand up and say, 'Our numbers are down. We don't have to serve as many people,'" she said. "This would do my heart good."

Professor to sponsor spring break trip to Great Britain

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

Several K-State students will visit a British museum and Westminster Abbey while studying abroad in London over spring break.

Don Hedrick, professor of English, will sponsor the trip to Great Britain over spring break.

He said about 10 students will go on the trip, titled "London: Theater and Social Space." They leave March 17 and return March 25.

Hedrick said the trip will cost $1,550 per student. It covers lodging, air travel, breakfast and tickets to the London professional theater, and participants will receive three hours of credit. Students must pay for lunch and dinner separately.

"Students will see a BBC broadcast live, have high tea and tour the major sights," Hedrick said. "International travel helps everyone, especially those interested in theater, arts and humanities."

Hedrick said students will eat breakfast together and then spend an hour and a half discussing the theater performance from the night before and the tours for that day.

"Each student will be an expert on one of the sites before the trip and then present to the rest of the group in the morning class," Hedrick said.

MORE INFO?

Interested students should contact Hedrick at 532-2160 or by e-mail at hedrick@ksu.edu.

"When they return they will write a report on their area of interest."

Hedrick said international travel will further education but is just as much fun as Cancun.

"London is one of the most exciting cities in the world to visit," Hedrick said. "No student would be sorry to have an opportunity like this."

Diana Hyle, freshman in open-option, said travel experience is always positive and gives a person an edge when looking for a job.

"I want to experience the difference between London theater culture and that of New York," Hyle said. "I would love to have a career in theater, and maybe that knowledge would give me an edge."

Jon Lamb, sophomore in English, said he hopes to see the culture from which so much literature was created.

"I hope to be a professor of English, and when studying literature you either study American or British," Lamb said. "I have immersed myself in American literature, and now I will be able to immerse myself in British literature."

The trip is sponsored by the Honors Program, but students do not have to be in the honors program to participate.

The deadline for the first payment is Dec. 16.

Enlisted female soldiers should receive praise

Those who defend our country deserve to be recognized. We are fortunate to be able to see some of the benefits that Fort Riley provides the nation through near-firsthand observation. We are extremely proud they are part of our community.

Everyone who is enlisted from the highest rank to the lowest — and even those who assist the enlisted — deserve to be applauded.

Another aspect that some people tend to overlook is the fact that a lot of men and women in the service have to be away from their families and loved ones during the holiday season. This act shows a tremendous amount of courage and strength.

Sometimes the only portrayal of women in the military is that they must deal with the negative events that occur.

However, there are far more cases, more stories of women who have positive experiences that often are untold or even worse: not noticed at all.

However, that is not the case with Helen Gough. Due to her hard work, determination and dedication, she has earned herself the Army's highest civilian position.

Everyone deserves to be recognized when they are not only willing to defend our country, but more importantly, to represent it.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Al Gore should forget politics and go to Hollywood. He is the best actor on TV.

The Republicans need to stop complaining about Gore contesting the election. Everybody knows that Bush would have done the same thing because he announced that he was planning on contesting if he lost several days before he was announced the winner.

I'm willing to stop for anyone who looks both ways at a crosswalk. If you don't look, you step out, watch your toes.

How dare Al Gore have the marbles to interrupt my "Monday Night Football."

Al Gore, if you would have won 20 days ago, would you have cared about all of those uncounted votes?

I've just solved world hunger with two words — ramen noodles.

If Al Gore was my dog, I'd shave its butt and teach him to walk backwards.

You really know you're an engineer when you read your Calc book on the toilet.

The bad news is that Dick Cheney averages a heart attack once every five years. The good news is that at least he will be out of office by the time the next one hits.

Often the campus operators are the first contact people have with this university. When they act rude and unprofessional, which they have the four times I have called them these past few weeks, it reflects very poorly on this university. Thank you.

Pop quiz: Finals week requires intense preparedness

Hope you're sitting down for this. After today, there are seven days of classes left.

Seven. Exactly the number of Kansas City Chiefs losses already this season. Not a huge number. We're running out of time, people. And if you've been wasting most of it away in a medication-induced delirium like I have (How can you tell? Have you used the phrase "refill my prescription or I shoot the puppy" lately?), the sudden arrival of finals is something of a shock to the system. Odds are you're just as unprepared as a Ralph Nader victory party coordinator.

Well, that's why I'm here. You might need some help on cramming for that final onslaught. And considering we're students on a university of nine different colleges and a horde of individual departments and curricula, it's hard to encompass an accurate gauge of everyone's class schedule. So this is a smorgasbord pop quiz, just to see if your mental processes are still working after 67 days of higher education. And to kill multiple birds with single stones, let's condense the categories, shall we?

No no. 2 pencils necessary. Use crayons or highlighters or your neighbor's blood if you need to (they won't mind). If you cheat, the honor code mandates you fling yourself into the nearest crosswalk. If you start to get dizzy or experience hallucinations, take a deep breath, relax and consider the possibility that maybe you're just not ready for finals yet.

Category 1: Current events/mathematics

1: Gov. George W. Bush's final lead over Vice President Al Gore in Florida is best reflected by the expression:

- a: e
- b: π
- c: i
- d: 0

Answer: c. It's an imaginary number.

Category 2:

Geography/political science

2: Which will become the United States' 51st state?

- a: Puerto Rico
- b: the District of Columbia
- c: Guam
- d: Canada

Answer: Anything except d. Canada's the United States' largest state, but in a quirk of historical fate, never got a star on the flag. And it's not getting a specially minted quarter, either (I know, they think they're a country. Isn't that cute?).

Category 3: Home economics/biology

3: Which of the following makes the most nutritious meal?

- a: squirrels
- b: kittens
- c: fuzzy duckies
- d: penguins

Answer: d. Penguins are innate culinary masters, able to prepare various fish products into veritable feasts (What? What did you think I meant? I'm not that hungry.).

Category 4: Computer science/law

4: The Recording Industry Association of America asserts that using Napster will:

- a: make you go blind
- b: cause Lars Ulrich to throw eggs at your house
- c: make Toni Braxton go bankrupt again
- d: lead to the eventual entropic death of the universe

Answer: all of the above. And it makes Jesus cry.

Category 5: Textiles/education

5: The telemarketer who has just called at 9 a.m. on the only day you can sleep in should be:

- a: wrapped up in a tweed strait-jacket
- b: crushed by a bolt of carpet
- c: torn apart by repeated attacks of Velcro on every possible scrap of body hair
- d: beaten by leather-clad kickboxers

Answer: b. They might like the other punishments too well.

Category 6: Veterinary medicine/child care

- 6: Billy, the child you are babysitting, has just noticed that Sparky, the family rat terrier, died peacefully in his sleep. You comfort Billy by:

- a: explaining that Sparky never liked Billy anyway and that death is just a release
- b: reminding Billy that every living thing dies, eventually, "Even you, Billy, EVEN YOU!" and pointing at him
- c: "Shhh, Billy, it's OK, you never had a dog. Never. Now forget it."
- d: demonstrating that death can come anytime, anywhere, by using Muffin the hamster and a blender

Answer: c. When in doubt, deny everything. (Alternate, classic tactic: "Oh, it's not dead, it's resting!")

Category 7:

Philosophy/physics

7: If a room floods in Denison Hall, does it make a sound?

- a: no
- b: yes, "glurble blub blurb"
- c: who the hell cares? Just blow the place up already!

Answer: c. Just make sure you let the Department of English know ahead of time, please. (Interesting note: spell-check rejects "Denison" and suggests "Venison." Mmm.)

Give yourself five points for every right answer. Give yourself an additional five points for realizing that fuzzy duckies are more scrumptious than kittens, squirrels or penguins. And another five points if you feel an inevitable rush of calamity upon yourself.

Scoring:

45-35 points — You're ready for finals. You're either inordinately caffeinated or just exceptionally perceptive. Your awareness of the world is unparalleled.

30-15 points — You're in mid-semester form, still. Time to transition to a "get me out of this suffocating class schedule" mindset. Learn to bite and tear your way through all obstacles. Start with edible obstacles, then move on to wood. There's still time.

10-5 points — Drop this newspaper, run down to the K-State Student Union and get some coffee. Drink it all. Then try again.

0 points — Check to see if you have a pulse. Ask your neighbor for help if you need it. If not, trot down to Lafene Health Center and explain that you are a corpse and are in need of serious attention. Read the rest of the paper and wait for your toe tag. It's snug and goes with summer or winter clothes! Whee!

BECKY WILSON/Collegian

Students, athletes should play by same rules

The sixth page in every Collegian features our beloved Wildcat student athletes. We cheer when they win and cry when they lose.

Some say it is because of the success of our athletic programs that we are a better university now than we were 10 years ago. Although we can give our players in sports programs much due credit for their success on the field of play, everyone on campus should be a student first no matter how many receptions they may have caught (or dropped) the previous Saturday.

One of my good friends is a Parking Services officer. While on our weekly Sunday night binge, he imparted to me interesting information about how athletes are treated differently than others in the realm of Parking Services.

It is the unspoken rule that vehicles that can be recognized as belonging to an athlete are not to be ticketed, and even those who do get ticketed usually succeed in their pleas to the appeals board.

Of course, I was not too surprised to hear about the benefits athletes were given at this university. When I worked for the Department of Housing and Dining Services, I delivered many cases of training table steaks to Derby Dining Center so that Manny Dies might be able to relieve his massive munchies. What annoyed me was that the area I had to drive the big ol' truck to was usually filled with illegally parked vehicles that made it difficult to make the regular deliveries.

My friend told me that this was one of the areas where Parking Services was told to stay away from because all of the football players parked there while they went to eat. For those of you unfamiliar with the area in question, it is the parking lot between Ford and Haymaker halls, so those of you who live in those residence halls, I give you this bit of information that Parking Services does not ticket in that area ... hint, hint.

Even those athletes who get a ticket and fail in their plea to the appeals board might not suffer any consequences. You see, every athlete is granted some type of "university allowance" of which they can use toward paying off parking fines. As if it wasn't enough that student athletes are given free tuition, books, etc, they also can park in front of a fire hydrant and (excuse the pun) have the water fall right off their backs with a quick call from "Coach."

During the course of my nine semesters on this campus I have incurred several tickets, two wheel locks and about $300 in fines. Somehow, it doesn't seem fair that I might be able to get away with it all had I been a Division III quality center from nearby Junction City.

Whether you're a graphic design major, equestrian rider or Groza Award finalist, you are a student who should play by the same rules as everyone, on and off the field.

This not only applies to the campus itself but in all areas of the city of Manhattan. Athletes somehow believe they deserve special attention in the various bars in Aggieville. The statement "Don't you know who I am?" has been used all too often to bouncers and bartenders who are just trying to do their jobs. To be perfectly honest, I wouldn't know one football player from another if he wasn't wearing a helmet with blonde dreadlocks drooling out of the back.

Former famous quarterback Chad May was in my bar once upon a time playing my boss in a game of Strikemaster. Upon defeating our proud QB, Duane proceeded to sign his name on a beer coaster and hand it to May.

"Here's my autograph," Duane said. "Hold onto it so that you can remember the day you got your ass beat." I heard that Chad May is selling cars somewhere now. My boss still drinks beer and plays Strikemaster.

In conclusion, our student athletes need to realize that, during their time at K-State, they are students first just like everyone else. Not all will make it to the NFL, the NBA or the Budweiser Cup (equestrians).

They need to learn, if they haven't already, that they will be expected to be respectful and humble no matter what they might do in life. Although some might receive extra attention from star-struck freshmen women and adoring alumni, we all should be equals in the eyes of the law.

Good luck to our football team in Kansas City, Mo., this weekend. If you win I'll buy you a beer, but all 80 of you have to share it.

Fraternity members sit on roof to raise money U.N. bill reduction demanded

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Hopes of not being on the roof for too long Tuesday evening were the wishes of three men who stood upon Rusty's Last Chance Restaurant & Saloon.

"It feels good to make a sacrifice," Justin Springer, junior in public relations, said. "We're going to sit out here in the cold until we raise the money."

The three men are members of Phi Gamma Delta and decided to volunteer their time in order to raise money for the Flint Hills Breadbasket. The Mayor's Holiday Tree Food and Fun Drive will continue until $1,000 is raised for holiday food baskets.

Raising this amount of money would allow the Breadbasket to create enough baskets to feed around 35 families.

"It seems like everyone is doing canned food drives, and we wanted to do something different," Springer said.

And something different is what they did. The three men will remain on the roof until the full $1,000 is raised, only leaving the roof to go to class. During that time, someone will fill in for them.

"It just seemed like a good way to help," said Jared Gudenkauf, junior in management information systems.

"Hopefully, we'll have some fun doing it."

Donations for the cause can be made to the fraternity or to the Breadbasket, but Springer said they expected to raise most of the money through direct interaction. A basket hanging from a string will allow those at the bar to donate money directly. A large gauge atop the roof will keep track of the money they have raised.

"The more we can help, the better," Scott Barkes, senior in education, said.

They said they hoped the amount of people around would pick up as the night went on.

"We are also hoping the drunk people at Rusty's will drop some money in the bucket," Barkes said.

Gudenkauf said the fact they are doing it in the cold weather instead of during the warmer months might help to raise more money.

"Since we're standing out in the cold weather, maybe people will feel more sorry for us and donate more money," he said.

If the money is not yet raised by Thursday, they will begin a pledge drive, calling people in order to raise donations. Until then, they said they will occupy their time by staying warm and playing games.

"This is our first time doing this, so we're just feeling our way through it," Springer said.

They had a two-man tent, chairs and an inflatable mattress to help keep them comfortable. Also, they had a power generator so they said they might hook up a television.

"In the Christmas spirit, we're giving our time so those less fortunate can eat," Barkes said.

Until the money is raised, they will remain on the roof. They said they hope the money is raised long before this weekend.

"We encourage people to come down here, because we want to go to the Big 12," Gudenkauf said. "We already bought our tickets, so help us get off the roof."

U.N. bill reduction demanded

By NICOLE WINFIELD
The Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — Concerned about the diplomatic effect of the U.S. presidential elections, two senators came to the United Nations on Tuesday to make clear that the United States will demand a reduction in its U.N. bills no matter who leads the next administration.

Republican Sens. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and Gordon Smith, a member of the Foreign Relations Committee, drove home that message to about a dozen ambassadors, arguing that they should approve the reduction now so the United Nations can get a chunk of the money the United States owes.

Washington, D.C., owes an estimated $1.8 billion to the United Nations in back dues that was tied up.

Congress approved legislation last year that would pay back $926 million of the arrears, but the full check can only be sent after the 189-member General Assembly agrees to reduce the U.S. share of the administrative budget and the peacekeeping budget.

Phineas Atchison knew what rested on his shoulders Tuesday night with 33.5 seconds left in overtime.

In fact, head coach Jim Wooldridge made it perfectly clear.

"After it got down to 10-15 seconds, he told everybody to go baseline with me up top and I was just gonna go one-on-one and try to come up with a shot, come up with a win," he said.

And come up with a win K-State did, as Atchison's 10-foot jumper off the dribble with 3.8 seconds remaining gave the Wildcats (2-1) a 69-67 victory over Tennessee State (1-4) in front of 4,802 at Bramlage Coliseum.

However, that clutch shot in overtime wasn't the only time Wooldridge called the junior's number Tuesday.

With 4.9 left in regulation and K-State trailing 58-55, the Cat coach also designed a play specifically for Atchison.

The guard inbounded the ball to Travis Reynolds, who was quickly double-teamed by the Tiger defense. Reynolds quickly gave the ball back to Atchison on the ■ K-State picks up on intensity to halt Tennessee State's run on treys Tuesday night in Bramlage.

By MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

Sometimes all it takes to win a ball game is a little bit of defense — and a little bit is what the Cats gave last night in their 69-67 overtime win over Tennessee State.

Until about eight minutes into the second half, K-State showed the same problems in defending the three-point shot that they had all season.

Entering last night's game, opponents had shot 34 percent from behind the arc against K-State, and for a while, it looked like Tennessee State wouldn't be any different.

With 12:26 left on the clock in the second half, the Tigers had drained their ninth trey and were in the midst of an 8-0 run.

From that point on, however, the Cats would only give up two more three-pointers in the game, just because they picked up the intensity a little bit, center Kelvin Howell said.

"Intensity. We've got to learn to come out with intensity from the jump ball to the end of the game, even if we go into overtime," he said Tuesday. "We just picked up the intensity on defense every day in practice."

"We practiced straight defense for four or five days. We've got to come out play defense, and defense will lead to offense, which gave us a great opportunity to win the game tonight."

Of course, when the Cats prepared for Tennessee State, they did so thinking the Tigers' offense would mainly revolve around driving to the basket, as it had in their previous games.

Instead, though, Tennessee State set up camp outside the three-point arc and launched 35 treys.

"We were playing a little off of them because, coming into the game, we thought that they were mostly going to try and drive and use their quickness against us," point guard Larry Reid said, "but they did it different and came out firing."

Head coach Jim Wooldridge said his team wasn't quite prepared for such a game plan from the Tigers, and, as a result, came out and played somewhat conservative on defense.

"This is the most patient they've played this year," he said of Tennessee State's offense. "They did a great job of moving the ball, and they made shots. They didn't make a lot of lay-ups — they didn't take a lot of lay-ups — but they made those perimeter shots, and it got us off-balance."

"Maybe it's the way we prepared for the thing, and then the way they ended up coming in and playing kept us off-balance. We played very tentative in the first half, very tentative."

When the Cats did start playing more aggressively, the game turned around, Reid said.

"We extended our defense out in the second half, and it made us better," he said.

SPORTS BRIEFS

Time change announced for women's basketball action Saturday at home

Women's basketball game times for the sixth annual Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic have been switched for Saturday.

K-State will play the early game at 5 p.m. Saturday against either Tennessee State or Texas A&M-Corpus Christi, regardless if the Wildcats are playing for the championship or consolation prize.

In turn, the second game will be played at 7 p.m. featuring Texas Southern against either Tennessee State or Texas A&M-Corpus Christi.

Michele Dubert of K-State Sports Information said changes were made to accommodate fans interested in viewing the 7 p.m. kick-off of the Big 12 Football Championship game between K-State and Oklahoma.

Ohlde awarded Big 12 Rookie of the Week

Freshman Nicole Ohlde was named the first 2000-01 Big 12 Conference Rookie of the Week on Monday.

The 6-foot-4 forward averaged 22 points and 12.5 rebounds in the Oregon State Beaver Classic last weekend. Despite being only her second collegiate outing, Ohlde shot 17-of-23 from the floor against Wyoming on Friday night, posting 36 points and grabbing 19 boards.

The Clay Center, Kan., native was named to the all-tournament team, and tied the Classic's record for most rebounds in a tournament with 25.

In addition, Ohlde's 36 points against the Cowboys were just two shy of the K-State school record, while eclipsing the school mark for a freshman. Her 17 field goals were also second all-time in school history and the most since 1995.

If her scoring success wasn't impressive, her 19 rebounds were only one shy of a school record and tied the most ever by a freshman. She also tied the school mark for highest field goal percentage in a half when she went 7-for-7 in the first 20 minutes of play.

Ohlde leads the K-State women in both scoring and rebounding, averaging 19.3 points and 9.3 rebounds per game, while shooting a scorching .659 from the field.

The Wildcats have posted five Big 12 Rookies of the Week since the league's inception. The most recent, Kristin Rethman, was honored Feb. 8, 1999.

Prediction on Big 12 race difficult

My original plan for today was to share with you my marvelous insights on the outcome of Saturday's Big 12 Championship game. The one catch is that I haven't had any insights yet — I still can't make up my mind on who has the upper hand.

But since my old friend Mr. Deadline is knocking on the door again, here's a fresh crop of Loosely Connected Thoughts to fill space while I mull over who I'll pick to win Saturday. Enjoy!

• Right now, I'm thinking Josh Heupel has the game of his life with everything on the line, and OU advances to the Orange Bowl with a 35-21 win.

• Speaking of loosely connected, is it just me, or does Chiefs coach Gunther Cunningham seem to be slowly unraveling?

Cunningham's squad has lost four straight now, and looked progressively worse in each loss. Before becoming head coach, Cunningham had established a reputation for being tough, consistent and energetic. Drifting aimlessly along the Chiefs' sideline Sunday, he looked none of the three. He looked like a beaten man — eerily similar to Marty Schottenheimer in his final days as Chiefs' skipper.

Though Carl Peterson reiterated Monday his faith in Cunningham, no coach in the NFL takes losing harder than Cunningham. If the Chiefs slog through the rest of their schedule like they have the last month, I wouldn't be surprised to see him step down at season's end.

• Speaking of coaching, I can't imagine any way Bill Snyder and company will be outcoached a second time by Bobby Stoops. I'm thinking K-State solves Josh Heupel and wins 27-17.

• Speaking of victories and defeats, here's an introduction I'd like to make: "Al Gore, this is dignity. Dignity. Al Gore. Now, you kids sit down together and get cracking on a concession speech. Chop, chop."

• Speaking of concessions, though most of the nation already has awarded the Heisman Trophy to FSU's Chris Weinke, my vote for Heisman still goes to OU quarterback Josh Heupel, regardless of what happens Saturday.

Sure, Weinke has the kind of numbers usually amassed only in Tecmo Super Bowl (on the easy setting), but he also plays on a more talented offense in a lesser league (try to name all of the ACC's teams — you'll get a candy bar if you can).

Heupel's numbers aren't as gaudy, but are still impressive. More importantly, he has played his best in OU's biggest games. No player has meant more or led his team to greater heights this season, and what should the Heisman be judged on if not for that?

• Speaking of numbers, K-State's offense has had a tough time putting up big stats in big games, and OU's defense is playing outstanding lately. I gotta go with the Sooners, 31-21.

• Speaking of large numbers, you know your fan support is a joke when Wichita State starts putting you to shame.

10,559 fans packed WSU's dumpy Levitt

Arena to the rafters for their game against Wichita State last week, showing their support for new Shocker coach Mark Turgeon in his debut. Their incessant, deafening noise badly rattled the Cats in a 76-66 defeat. By contrast, Jim Wooldridge's K-State debut, played in a beautiful facility, in a town with far fewer other things to do, drew a pathetic 4,500 fans.

Anyone who doubts what kind of difference a strong home court advantage can make should have seen the Shocker faithful last Tuesday night. One more time, K-State fans — you pay for what you get. If you want a dominant basketball team again, you have to do your part to make Bramlage the formidable home court that it could so easily be.

• Speaking of home court/field advantage, K-State will have that in Kansas City, Mo. That, and they'll have a good game plan of how to stop the Sooners. But then again, they had all those things the first time around, and it did them precious little good.

It's tough to call here, but the Cats are too good and have too many things going in their favor in this rematch for me to imagine them losing again. If K-State avoids the on-field mistakes that plagued them last time against OU, they pull the upset. What the heck — K-State 24, OU 14.

But I reserve the right to change my prediction at any time.

Student-choreographed dances, guest artists join for production of

WINTERDANCE

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Long rehearsals, difficult routines and a good many worn-in leotards are about to pay off for the organizers of WinterDance 2000.

WinterDance will feature nine student-choreographed dance pieces and one piece choreographed by guest artist Roni Mahler, the founding director of the K-State dance program.

Each piece will feature student dancers who have been preparing most of the semester for the show, said Elizabeth Moran,
faculty coordinator for WinterDance.

Moran, director of dance for K-
State, said her role as coordinator means she helps to organize the production, but the technical aspects of the dance are all handled by students. The direction, choreography, management, lighting and sound all are taken on by students, which kindles a pride in those involved in the production of the show, she said.

"I enjoy seeing the pride and sense of accomplishment the students have," she said. "They have grown and progressed through the production. When that kind of learning takes place and they feel good about it, you can tell they want to share that with others."

Since the show is student-run,
Kristi McKee, assistant stage manager, said it is a good opportunity to see what the students can do.
Students feel more attached to pieces created by their peers and relate to them easier. This brings about more of a sense of accomplishment for the performers, she said.

"The show displays a lot of creativity and it's really from the heart," McKee, junior in advertising, said. "They aren't just out there dancing because they are told to.

They feel like a part of the creation of these pieces."

Due to the varying tastes of each creator, there is a great variety in the pieces at WinterDance, which should attract a broad audience, dancer
Marcie Mamura said.

It is an excellent opportunity for the students involved to gain experience in the creation process and it has ended up being a dynamic set of pieces, Mamura, junior in dance, said.

WinterDance will be a unique show this year not only because of the student involvement, but also because it is the debut of the Kansas State Repertory
Dance Company.

The KSRDC, which formed this semester, was founded by Mahler and has eight members who all are featured in the final dance of the night, choreographed by Mahler, Mamura said.

The student element of WinterDance has created a camaraderie among those involved, McKee said, and many feel proud to be involved in such a large production.
She said she just hopes people take the opportunity to enjoy what these students have put so much work into.

WinterDance is an excellent opportunity for students to become acquainted with the dance department, Mamura said. It seems many people aren't very aware of its presence and it is a hidden treasure with a great deal to share with those who don't know much about the art of dance, she said.

"I think we have a lot to offer anyone, even those who aren't dance enthusiasts, as long as they are open to artistic expression," she said.
"Dance is a form of communication that you can't contain. It's only here for a second, it lives and breathes in the moment, and being able to share that with the audience is amazing."

International architecture on display in Seaton

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Professional displays of architecture have been competitively judged and will be shown in an international exhibit.

"The Architecture in Perspective 15" exhibit is showing from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.
now until Dec. 15 at the Chang Gallery in Seaton Hall.

The American Society of Architectural Perspectivists has presented the exhibit since 1986, and it travels for only 18 to 20 months.

"It's an annual international competition and exhibition of architectural illustration," said Diane Potts, assistant to the dean of the College of Architecture Planning and Design. "It is the single most prestigious forum for the display of original contemporary architectural illustration, both digital and analog."

More than 60 pieces were selected out of 450 entries by a distinguished jury of 15 professionals in the fields of architecture, illustration and design education. The drawings come from every continent but Antarctica.

"The artists are from everywhere around the world," said Dennis Law, dean of the College of Architecture, Planning and Design. "Different drawings from all types of regions are shown."

The most prestigious and highest award for the year's most outstanding work is the Hugh Ferriss Memorial Prize.
The prize is awarded for excellence in the graphic representation of architecture.

"It honors the memory of Ferriss," Law said. "The design has to best exemplify Ferriss' ideal, which is revealing the truth about architecture through buildings and ideals."
This year's winner is Thomas W.
Schaller.

"The society was formed to foster communication among architectural perspectives, to raise the standards of architectural drawing and to acquaint a broader public with the importance of such drawings as a conceptualizing and communication tool in architecture," Potts said.

The exhibit is sponsored by the K-State Fine Arts Fee.

Law said they received a call from one of the artists in Kansas City, Mo.

"They called us, asking if we would be interested in hosting the exhibit, since the international competition had just taken place in Kansas City," Law said. "They wanted to display the exhibit somewhere close as recently after the competition as possible."

The exhibit is open to the public.

Electric company asks Kansas regulators to increase rates

By JOHN HANNA
The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state's largest electric company is asking Kansas regulators to increase its rates enough to raise an additional $151 million each year.

Separate requests were filed Monday with the Kansas Corporation Commission by the KPL and KGE subsidiaries of Western Resources Inc., which has its headquarters in Topeka.

KPL's residential customers would see their rates increase an average of 19.5 percent. The average increase for KGE's residential customers would be 10 percent.

The filings came about two weeks after Western announced it planned to sell KPL and KGE to the Public Service Company of New Mexico, or PNM, of Albuquerque. A condition of the sale is that Western separate KPL and KGE from its unregulated subsidiaries.

The filings also follow months of public debate over the different rates charged to KPL and KGE customers. KGE customers pay about 25 percent more for their electricity.

Under Kansas law, the KCC has six months to make a decision.

"We are always sensitive to the rates our customers pay," David Wittig, Western's chairman, president and chief executive officer, said in a statement. "We strive to balance their desire for the lowest possible prices and our commitment to provide safe, reliable electric service."

Western officials contend they need the extra revenue to cover the costs of new generators powered by natural gas. The company invested $230 million in those generators.

Wittig said the new generators allowed Western's subsidiaries to meet growing demands for power. In the past decade, that demand has grown by 22 percent.

However, some of Western's industrial customers and the Citizens' Utility Ratepayers Board, a state agency that represents consumers, believe Western's subsidiaries already are earning more than they should.

One group of large businesses, Kansas Industrial Consumers, contends Western is earning $100 million more than it should. The group includes Farmland Industries, Boeing Co. and General Motors.

Walker Hendrix, CURB's consumer counsel, said Western's increasing profits and other factors show that the company doesn't need a rate increase.

Last month, Western announced year-to-date earnings of about $2.39 per share of common stock based on $164.7 million in net income. That is up from the $1.31 per share for the same period in 1999, when the company recorded $88.2 million in net income.

"Common sense would tell you that the customers are entitled to a rate reduction," Hendrix told The Topeka Capital-Journal.

Wichita Mayor Bob Knight, a key figure in the fight over the disparity in rates for KPL and KGE customers, called the proposal for a KGE rate increase an appalling display of corporate arrogance and greed.

"To propose a rate increase is something only a callous monopoly with no threat of competition could get away with," Knight said.

Knight said KCC members should be watchdogs for consumers and not lapdogs for Western Resources.

Topeka Mayor Joan Wagon said she is willing to believe that Western needs a rate increase but isn't convinced it needs $151 million.

"I don't want to be unfair to the company, but that just seems excessive," Wagon said late Monday. "They are going to have to prove that every dollar of that increase is needed."

The KCC sets electric rates because customers cannot choose another company in Western's service territories. The KPL service area covers northeast Kansas, while the KGE service area covers southeast and south-central Kansas.

Under the KPL proposal, an average residential customer would pay an additional $9.25 a month. Western bases that figure on an average electric use of 750 kilowatt hours a month.

The proposed changes in KPL rates would raise about $93 million. Under the KGE plan, its customers would pay an additional $58 million a year.

The average increase for a residential customer would be $6.50 a month. The current average monthly bill for KGE's residential customers is $65.19, compared to $47.41 for KPL customers.

That disparity led the city of Wichita to file a complaint with the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission in September 1999, asking it to make KPL and KGE rates equal.

Wichita area officials argue it is unfair for different customers of the same company to pay different rates.

But officials in northeast Kansas, led by Wagon, said trying to make the rates equal would lead to large increases in rates in northeast Kansas. She also said the KCC has moved toward rate parity in previous orders.

A FERC judge said earlier this month that the different rates did not have to be equalized. Wichita is appealing the order.

"We've dodged one bullet," Wagon said. "We don't want to be caught by the second one."

Complicating the case is Western's announced intention to sell its electric utilities to PNM. That deal, worth about $4.4 billion, also must be approved by the KCC and several federal regulatory agencies.

Although PNM officials have declined to condition their purchase of the utilities on Western obtaining approval of a rate increase, they have stressed that they will be watching the KCC proceedings closely.

Israelis vote for new election

By MARK LAVIE
The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Israel's parliament voted overwhelmingly Tuesday to have new elections, after Prime Minister Ehud Barak — his government shaken by two months of street battles with the Palestinians — reluctantly agreed to hard-liners' demands for an early vote.

Polls have shown elections would be a risky proposition for Barak, as his minority government has been steadily losing support from many Israelis who perceive him as ineffective in ending the bloodshed.

However, a vote probably would not take place before spring, giving Barak time for a last-ditch effort to forge a peace agreement with the Palestinians. Elections could serve as a referendum on the agreement.

Palestinian officials said they were hopeful an accord could be reached before the elections.

The 120-member legislature voted separately on five bills calling for early elections. Four of the bills were approved by more than 70 members of the house. Only three legislators were opposed, and the rest abstained.

The date for elections will be set in the coming days by party leaders.

Barak said the vote could take place as late as nine months from now, while several opposition lawmakers said they expected elections in May, two years after Barak took office.

Parliament had settled into a long debate on the five bills Tuesday evening when Barak made an unexpected appearance before the lawmakers. In a speech, Barak announced he no longer would resist the opposition push for elections.

"I do not flinch from elections. I say if you want elections, let there be elections for prime minister and for the Knesset," Barak told parliament.

Throughout the day, Barak saw the opposition gain more and more votes, until it became clear that more than half the members would vote against him.

In his speech, Barak blamed opposition leader Ariel Sharon for rejecting his offer to create a unity government. However, in a later TV interview, Barak also acknowledged that he had made mistakes.

Recent polls have indicated that if elections took place now, Barak would be defeated by any opposition candidate, including Sharon and former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

Israeli commentators said Barak's only chance to remain in power was to reach a peace agreement.

"Ehud Barak is running in the election without a government, without a majority in the Knesset, without a majority in the polls and without a majority of the public," said Hanan Crystal, a political analyst. "He is running on one issue only, whether he is capable of reaching an agreement with Yasser Arafat by election day."

U.S. officials said the developments were not unexpected. P.J. Crowley, spokesman for President Clinton's National Security Council, said: "This has been conjectured in Israel for some time, so I don't know we were surprised by it," Crowley said. "It is an internal matter."

HOLIDAY GIFT GUIDE

Creative gifts you can make for less than $10

Ben Franklin Crafts floor manager Jan Zelch suggests these projects for holiday gift-giving.

Candle holder

Items needed: basket, candle, glass candle holder, ribbon, dolly
Time: 15 minutes
1. Cut 1.5 yards of ribbon and tie in bow.
2. Use thin wire to tie the bow around the basket handle.
3. Drape dolly over one side of the basket.
4. Place candle in candle holder and put in the middle of the basket.

Christmas ornament

Items needed: felt, poly fill, garland, embroidery floss
Time: 30 minutes
1. Using a die cut machine (available for use at Ben Franklin Gifts) and cut two pieces of felt with the mitten-shaped block.
2. Using the die cut machine, cut one piece of felt with the Christmas tree block.
3. Using embroidery floss, blanket stitch the two mitten halves together.
4. Glue the Christmas tree to one side of mitten.
5. Fill the mitten with poly fill.
6. Use 18 inches of garland and glue each end to the inside of the mitten.
7. Stitch the base of the mitten together.
8. Glue poly fill around the mitten's rim.

Papier-mâché box

Items needed: pictures, box, Mod Podge adhesive, sponge brush
Time: 2 hours
1. Tear pictures out of a magazine, old calendar or use photocopied photographs.
2. Cut them up.
3. Choose any shape of box.
4. Arrange pictures on outside of box, making sure they overlap.
5. Using the sponge brush, cover the box with the Mod Podge adhesive. It acts as a clear glue.
6. Apply as many coats as desired.
7. Leave it alone to dry.

PHOTOS BY STEVEN DEARINGER/Collegian

Ben Franklin Crafts displays models of creative gift ideas. All materials needed can be purchased there, or at any other craft store.

Picture frame

Items needed: photograph, matte board, frame or easel, stickers
Time: 45 minutes
1. Choose desired photograph.
2. Choose matte board to place photograph behind.
3. Decorate matte board with sayings or stickers.
4. If putting on an easel, mount picture on to foam board.
5. If putting in a frame, choose frame and place the matte board and photograph in it.

Memory book

Items needed: photographs, photo album, stickers, glue, scissors
Time: minutes to hours
1. Using fancy cut scissors, crop selected photographs.
2. Choose which pictures to go on what page.
3. Glue them on to a base page.
4. Write information next to the picture, such as who or what is in the picture and the date it was taken.
5. Then decorate page with stickers or shapes from the die cut machine.

Celebration of faiths observed by students

By LYNNE HERMANSEN
Kansas State Collegian

Students of all faiths and backgrounds will be taking part in holiday festivities over winter break.

Justin Rosenberg, senior in computer science, has celebrated Hanukkah with his father and brother every year.

"My Dad is Jewish, but not very religious, so it is the one time of year my brother and I are able to celebrate the Jewish faith with him," he said.

Rosenberg's mother celebrates Christmas, so he takes part in both holidays.

"It was really cool when I was little," he said. "I used to brag to all my friends that I got Christmas and eight presents from Hanukkah."

Rosenberg said Hanukkah is one of the lesser Jewish holidays, but is made big commercially.

"If you are really religious, it is one of the more insignificant holidays," he said. "Its significance has been somewhat lost for me."

However, Rosenberg said Hanukkah was significant for him last year.

"I was unable to celebrate in the dorms last year, because of their 'no burning candles' policy," he said.

Hanukkah will begin on the night of Dec. 21 and end on the night of Dec. 28.

Hanukkah was originally the celebration of the Jewish people driving the Greeks out of Jerusalem and reclaiming their temple. It then evolved into the miracle of a flame burning for eight days off of one day's supply of oil.

"The flame is supposed to symbolize God's presence," David Margolies, adviser of Hillel Jewish Temple, said.

Traditionally, families light one candle each night for eight nights.

"The lighting of the menorah usually takes place in the home with some singing and praying," Margolies said.

Margolies said it is also tradition to eat fried foods during the celebration of Hanukkah.

"Popular fried foods are potato pancakes, which are fried in oil and similar to hash browns," he said. "Jelly doughnuts are also typically eaten."

Margolies said the more recent tradition has been to exchange small

Nguzo Saba (Seven Principles)

Umoja (Unity) — to strive for and maintain unity in the family, community, nation and race.

Kujichagulia (Self-determination) — to define ourselves, name ourselves, create for ourselves and speak for ourselves.

Ujima (Collective work and responsibility) — to build and maintain our community together and make our sisters and brothers problems our problems and to solve them together.

Ujamaa (Cooperative economics) — to build and maintain our own stores, shops and businesses together.

Nia (Purpose) — to make our collective vocation the building of our community to restore our people to their traditional greatness.

Kuumba (Creativity) — to do as much as we can to leave our community more beautiful and beneficial than we inherited it.

Imani (Faith) — to believe with our hearts in our people, our parents, our teachers, our leaders and the righteousness and victory of our struggle.

at his sister's house."

Korri Hall, senior in social science, will spend a week of her holidays celebrating the African-American holiday of Kwanzaa.

"I was first introduced to Kwanzaa about 10 years ago," Hall said. "I celebrate it with my mom and sisters. Kansas City usually has a big community celebration."

Kwanzaa was started in 1966 by Maulana Karenga, a professor at California University in Long Beach, Calif.

Kwanzaa means "the first fruits" in Swahili, and it is celebrated from Dec. 26 to Jan. 1. Each day represents a different principle, and each principle has a Swahili name.

The seven principles are Umoja (unity), Kujichagulia (self-determination), Ujima (collective work), Ujamaa (cooperative economics), Nia (purpose), Kuumba (creativity) and Imani (faith). The seven principles as a whole are known as Nguzo Saba.

"African-Americans are encouraged to strive for the principles throughout their whole lives," Hall said.

Kwanzaa also lights candles in a kinara, a stand similar to the Jewish menorah. There are three red candles on the left, one black candle in the middle and three green candles on the right.

"These colors represent the African colors," Hall said.

"Traditionally black stands for the face of our people, red for the blood our people shed and green for the hope and the color of the motherland."

The candles are lit each day alternating from left to right.

Hall said for each day there is a different activity with certain rituals.

"Each ritual has libations, which are to honor those who have gone before us," she said.

Hall said celebrating Kwanzaa has great meaning for her.

"It gives me a chance to honor those who have paved the way for me," she said. "I could not be the person that I am today if it wasn't for the forefathers who broke down the barriers of segregation."

presents each of the eight nights.

"The gift exchanging is new and typically involves small presents, but sometimes people go all out, such as they do for Christmas," Margolies said.

Sarah Emerson, fifth-year student in architectural engineering, also celebrates Hanukkah.

"I have celebrated the holiday for as long as I can remember," she said.

Emerson said her mom usually makes a big meal the first or second night of Hanukkah.

"I normally just eat the potato latkes, because I do not like anything else," she said.

Emerson said now that she has her own apartment, she has her own Menorah which she lights.

"I make latkes and dinner for my friends," she said. "I teach them about Hanukkah and the songs. We also play dreidel."

Emerson said her father's side of the family is Christian.

"He still celebrates Hanukkah with my mom, sister and I," she said. "For Christmas, we eat dinner

Holiday tour features 6 homes

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Friends of McCain are hoping community members will support the McCain Performance Series by purchasing tickets for the Holiday Home Tour 2000 before heading off to the football match-up between K-State and the Oklahoma Sooners on Saturday.

"We're hoping people will come out even though there's a conflict with the Big 12 Championship," Ann Murray, Holiday Home Tour chairwoman, said. "The tour will be all day, and the game doesn't start until 7 p.m."

Tickets for the tour are $15 each, with money benefiting McCain Performance Series events.

Ticketholders have access to five homes in Manhattan, and the Beta Theta Pi fraternity. Homes can be visited in any order from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

Murray said the home tour is an important fund-raising effort for the group. Without this support, she said, it would not be possible to get the quality of performers for the series.

"I think a lot of people don't realize the full cost of performances isn't covered through tickets," she said.

Verlyn Richards, Friends of McCain president, said the holiday tour takes place opposite years of a similar tour sponsored by the Riley County Historical Society. He said this is the 15th tour for the Friends of McCain.

"Each home tour we try to have one fraternity or sorority," Richards said. "At the fraternity or sorority house we have refreshments for those going on the tour."

Richards said volunteers are on hand at each house to explain the highlights.

"We have about 130 volunteers who work with the houses on the day of the tour," he said. "It's a pretty substantial effort."

Even though so many people work on the day of the event, Richards said planning begins a year in advance.

"We actually start out in January of the year with a list of prospective homes," he said. "It takes some time to get people to agree to be in the tour."

Jeff Rundle, Beta Theta Pi president, said the tour is a chance for community members to see the history behind the house. He said highlights of the tour include a table in the card room and chandeliers and a fireplace exported from a castle in England.

"It's just an opportunity to open up our house and give people a chance to see what we're about," Rundle said. "We hope to reach out to the community and let them know they are welcome. Hopefully, they will be more comfortable with what a fraternity is about."

Even though all of the homes on the tour will be decorated for the holidays, Murray said people often are more interested in permanent fixtures.

"People are just interested in how others create living space," she said. "I think each house has very interesting features. Each house has its own little personality."

Unusual options replace plain holiday gift ideas

By JJ DUNCAN
Kansas State Collegian

Finding a distinctive gift for each person on the gift list this year can be a challenge.

Bryce Ahana, sales clerk at Hotline, said the store carries many items that would make interesting gifts this holiday. The fact that some of them are in the back room where customers are required to be at least 18 to enter just adds more interest.

"We have gag gifts like whips and other toys or if someone is just plain freaky," Ahana said.

Ahana said there are many gift ideas available for someone who wants to decorate his or her apartment. Black lights, beaded curtains and neon paint could help someone give an apartment a unique look.

When trying to find a unique gift for each of her friends, Melinda Snyder, freshman in apparel design, decided the best way to personalize each gift according to the recipient was to make the gifts herself. Snyder is going to use her sewing skills to make a different shirt for each friend on her gift list, she said.

Snyder said she uses a technique where she sews folds into the shirts to create line designs. Her friends have asked her to make things for them before so she said it is nice to finally be able to give them something she made that they will wear.

She likes the idea of giving each person such a personal gift and she also likes to see people wearing her designs, she said.

"It's fun to see someone wearing something you made," she said. "Just like a hairdresser might get enjoyment from seeing someone walking around with the hair they did, I get the same type of fulfillment from making the clothes."

For the person who has no need for decor for their apartment and hand-sewn items just aren't their thing, perhaps decor for the body would be a good idea.

John Fitzgerald, co-owner of Stray Cat Tattoo and Piercing, said the shop is now selling gift certicates which would make unique Christmas gifts.

The gift certificates are available for a specific piercing or can be purchased for any dollar amount. They can be used on tattoos, piercings or various types of body jewelry.

Fitzgerald said what makes a tattoo a unique gift is that other gifts might break or get lost or forgotten but a tattoo will always be there, can't be forgotten and will always be a reminder of that time in life.

"On the diamond commercials they say to give the gift that lasts a lifetime, but a tattoo is truly a gift that lasts a lifetime," he said.

This holiday season there are many ideas that stray from the Furby or any other mainstream common gift. Ahana said he enjoys helping people find gifts in the holiday season and people should look at it as a chance to have fun and buy some unusual things.

"Shopping for Christmas presents is like an adventure and I'm helping people out because I'm the adventure guide," he said.

Holiday cards offer good way to beat stress

By ERIN DEHN
Kansas State Collegian

She sits on her couch with a pen in her hand and a mission to be accomplished. The television is on, but it's merely background noise. Nothing can distract her concentrating on the stack of Christmas cards on her lap.

For Jennifer Kreifels, senior in family studies and human services, the holiday season means lots of writing and licking envelopes. She is one of many who keeps the postal service thriving over the holidays by sending cards. She is a card junkie.

"At night, when I don't want to do homework and it's cold outside, I just want to turn on a movie and fill out Christmas cards," she said.

Kreifels said working on Christmas cards is a way to unwind from the end of semester stress.

"It's a stress reliever," she said.

Kreifels begins her card campaign during the sales after Christmas, when she restocks her supply. Then, when November rolls around, she prepares each card with a personalized greeting. This year, Kreifels said she will be sending out about two boxes worth of cards to friends and family.

"I just go through my address book from A to Z," Kreifels said.

It's a tradition for Kreifels, who said she sends cards to let loved ones know she is thinking about them.

"When you read the greetings on the cards, you're like, 'Oh yeah, share the Christmas joy,'" she said.

Kreifels said she can spend hours in Hallmark or at the card aisle in Wal-Mart reading cards.

"I have a Hallmark Gold Card, and with each purchase I get points," she said. "I just got a coupon, so I went and bought more cards."

The tradition of Christmas cards dates back to 1843 when the first known card was produced. It was the brainchild of Sir Henry Cole and designed by his friend, John Calcott Horsley. The center of the card pictured a family enjoying holiday celebrations and raising their glasses to a toast. The side panels displayed acts of charity.

Early cards rarely incorporated a religious theme. George Buday, author of "The History of the Christmas Card," said in his book that these cards were associated with the social appeal—the festivities connected with Christmas more than the religious functions of the season.

Items such as mistletoe and holly began to adorn cards as early as the 1840s. Kissing under mistletoe became a popular card subject and by the turn of the century photographs were entering the scene.

The material used to construct cards has varied, from satin to pasteboard, dried codfish to silk to simple paper. Buday, an avid Christmas card collector, described the smallest Christmas card he had seen as a grain of rice given to his royal highness, the Duke of Windsor, in 1929. The greeting was inscribed on the grain, which was attached to a piece of pasteboard.

An important facet of the card industry is the sentiment, a sweet saying or poem found on most cards. During the infancy of the card, the sentiment was of little importance compared to the art. Today the sentiment sells.

One company that perhaps knows the importance of the sentiment is Hallmark. According to Ellen Stock Stern, author of "The Very Best From Hallmark: Greeting Cards Through the Years," Hallmark produces 2,500 different Christmas cards each year.

Almost $4 billion is spent in a year to purchase 7 billion cards. Christmas is ranked the No. 1 holiday for card-sending, with more than 2 billion Christmas cards delivered every year.

The birth of the Internet brought competition to the traditional snail-mail card. Now, cards can be e-mailed for free. Sites such as www.noelternet.com offer a variety of cards for every occasion. Noel Eternel Inc. said more than 20,000 cards were sent during the site's first month of existence in 1998. The company said it is difficult to determine how many people utilize e-mail cards around the world, but they estimate the numbers are high.

Despite the cost-free, easy access of e-mail cards, many people still believe the time, money and energy used on sending cards is well-spent.

Holiday tour features 6 homes

By REED DUNN
Kansas State Collegian

Friends of McCain are hoping community members will support the McCain Performance Series by purchasing tickets for the Holiday Home Tour 2000 before heading off to the football match-up between K-State and the Oklahoma Sooners on Saturday.

"We're hoping people will come out even though there's a conflict with the Big 12 Championship," Ann Murray, Holiday Home Tour chairwoman, said. "The tour will be all day, and the game doesn't start until 7 p.m."

Tickets for the tour are $15 each, with money benefiting McCain Performance Series events.

Ticketholders have access to five homes in Manhattan, and the Beta Theta Pi fraternity. Homes can be visited in any order from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday.

Murray said the home tour is an important fund-raising effort for the group. Without this support, she said, it would not be possible to get the quality of performers for the series.

"I think a lot of people don't realize the full cost of performances isn't covered through tickets," she said.

Verlyn Richards, Friends of McCain president, said the holiday tour takes place opposite years of a similar tour sponsored by the Riley County Historical Society. He said this is the 15th tour for the Friends of McCain.

"Each home tour we try to have one fraternity or sorority," Richards said. "At the fraternity or sorority house we have refreshments for those going on the tour."

Richards said volunteers are on hand at each house to explain the highlights.

"We have about 130 volunteers who work with the houses on the day of the tour," he said. "It's a pretty substantial effort."

Even though so many people work on the day of the event, Richards said planning begins a year in advance.

"We actually start out in January of the year with a list of prospective homes," he said. "It takes some time to get people to agree to be in the tour."

Jeff Rundle, Beta Theta Pi president, said the tour is a chance for community members to see the history behind the house. He said highlights of the tour include a table in the card room and chandeliers and a fireplace exported from a castle in England.

"It's just an opportunity to open up our house and give people a chance to see what we're about," Rundle said. "We hope to reach out to the community and let them know they are welcome. Hopefully, they will be more comfortable with what a fraternity is about."

Even though all of the homes on the tour will be decorated for the holidays, Murray said people often are more interested in permanent fixtures.

"People are just interested in how others create living space," she said. "I think each house has very interesting features. Each house has its own little personality."

Discount stores in competition with online shopping, e-commerce sites

By ANNE D'INNOCENZIO
The Associated Press

NEW YORK — When it comes to e-commerce, traditional discounters are no longer waiting idly in the wings.

After several false starts, Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the world's largest retailer, is making a play to be as much a powerhouse online as it is offline, reopening its renovated Web site Tuesday.

Meanwhile, Target Corp. unveiled its own redesigned site last Friday, boasting better graphics and an improved search engine. And Kmart Corp. this week officially flashed its BlueLight.com site, after quietly launching it in June.

With more consumers becoming Web savvy — 51 percent of American households are expected to be online this year, up from 45 percent last year, according to New York-based Jupiter Communications — the discount behemoths aim to seize a larger share of the e-commerce pie.

But the discounters have much catching up to do. Despite its stock taking a recent hit, e-tailing veteran Amazon.com has dominated traffic on the Web, attracting 14.3 million people to its site in September alone, according to Jupiter's Media Metrix.

That same month, Kmart's BlueLight.com had just 2 million customers, while Target.com attracted 1.5 million and Walmart.com 1.4 million.

But Wal-Mart, Kmart and Target say they're counting on their brand appeal to win customers online.

Take, for example, Karen Bakos, a 38-year-old New York resident, who is a loyal Amazon shopper, but is open to shopping online because of the discounters' reputation for low prices.

"If the sites are easy to use, then I would definitely use them," she said. "I just had a baby, and it's hard to get out. I would buy toys and clothing."

All three discounters are trying to closely link their online and offline businesses, using their stores to advertise the sites.

Yet each discounter is also trying to carve out its own niche. For example, the Minneapolis-based Target is limiting its online offerings to 15,000, with a focus on trendy and profitable items like Phillips toasters and Michael Graves housewares.

Kmart mixes such basic products as baby strollers with image-brand items like Martha Stewart sheets, while BlueLight.com is selling 300,000 items, up from 50,000 in June.

Then there's the Bentonville, Ark.-based Wal-Mart, whose 4-year foray into e-commerce has been rather rocky.

Its latest Web makeover is being spearheaded by Jeanne Jackson, chief executive officer of Walmart.com.

"It's just a refreshing," she said, adding the site's closing was necessary to shift to speedier technology.

The makeover includes revamping the search engine to make it easier to find any one of 500,000 items, adding sharper graphics, and expanding such categories as toys, electronic gadgets and other gift items.

Bureau offers tips for online shoppers

By APRIL MIDDLETON
Kansas State Collegian

Shopping online may make holiday shopping just a click away for consumers. The Better Business Bureau says holiday shoppers must remember that even in the newly high tech world of the Internet the same rules apply to shopping — always know who you are buying from.

Joyce Woodard, president of Better Business Bureau of Northeast Kansas, said people have to remember to check out who they are buying from, regardless of how much money is involved.

"Just because a company is online doesn't mean it is legitimate," she said. "People have to check out these companies before you give them credit card or bank account numbers."

Tips from the Better Business Bureau:

■ Shop with merchants you know, or research before you buy. If you're not familiar with an online store, take the same precautions you would in a traditional marketplace. Responsible online merchants will clearly post their physical address and telephone number on their web site. Use that information to check the business's complaint record with the Better Business Bureau (www.bbb.org).

■ Know the merchant's customer satisfaction policies and the terms of the sale. Before making a purchasing decision, consumers should look for information regarding shipping time frame, return, refund or exchange policies. Get a full itemized list of costs involved in the sale, with a clear designation of the terms, conditions and methods of payments.

■ Understand the difference between buying from a business and buying from a private seller. Be aware that your legal rights against an individual may not be the same as against a business. While many private sellers are legitimate, your legal recourse may be different if you're not satisfied with the merchandise. Whether buying from a business or private seller, be wary of "too good to be true" prices or deals.

■ Use your payment card to shop online. If you decide to use your credit or charge card to pay for goods and services online, your liability under federal law is limited to $50.

■ Be in a secure environment at point of purchase. Before providing your credit card or financial information, be certain you are using a secure browser that will encrypt the personal data you are about to transmit online.

■ Check out the merchant's "security system." Once your personal and financial information is transmitted safely to the merchant, is the information stored in a secure manner? Look for information about the online merchant's security policies that indicates the merchant provides industry standard levels of security for the storage of personal data, as well as the payment and collection of personal data. Protect your password.

■ Exercise the right to protect your privacy. Stop at merchant sites that have posted privacy policies that reveal what personally identifiable information is collected about you, and how it will be used, and offer you options about the use of your personal information. The only information reputable merchants typically require is your password, credit card number and shipping information.

■ Keep a record of your transactions. Just as you would save your receipt in case you need to return or exchange an item, you'll want to keep a record of all online transactions, including the merchant's URL.

■ Know your consumer rights. The same laws that protect you when you shop by phone or mail apply when you shop in cyberspace. Under the law, a company must ship your order within the time stated in its advertisements, and not more than 30 days after the order date. If you decide to pay by credit card or charge card, your transaction will be protected by the Fair Credit Billing Act. Additional information about your consumer rights is available through the Federal Trade Commission web site (www.ftc.gov).

Manhattan businesses give during holiday season

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

While most people associate the word giving with the holiday season, several Manhattan merchants associate that particular word with the entire year.

Roy Hulett, manager of Wal-Mart, said their store works on a continuous basis with Flint Hills Breadbasket, the Crisis Center, the Salvation Army and the Home Care Hospice Tree of Life, as well as other organizations in and around the Manhattan area.

Hulett said they do not have an Angel Tree set up where individuals can purchase gifts for children based on their information on the tree. Instead, Wal-Mart does something for senior citizens.

"We do a slipper tree. Customers purchase slippers, and we take them to a nursing home," Hulett said.

The nursing home that receives the slippers alternates every year.

Another big event around the Manhattan area is Shop With A Cop, which will be Dec. 2. Also on that day, Wal-Mart will donate a portion of their sales from 7 a.m. until noon as a donation for the event.

Under the Shop With A Cop program, the Riley County Police Department, as well as some members of the fire department and the officers' spouses, are paired with underprivileged children. They go shopping, help them pick out presents, and then purchase them.

Hulett said they have been doing the program for around eight years, and the numbers of the children increase with every holiday season.

"This year it is at 130," Hulett said. "It is one of the neatest things all year."

Randy Crow, marketing director for the Manhattan Town Center, said the mall also works year round in terms of helping children who are not as fortunate. Crow said they do Kids For Kars to help with the Home Care for Hospice and the Flint Hills Breadbasket as well as contributing in ways they can to other organizations or charities.

Another program, which also is Dec. 2, is the 14th Toy Run, which is ran through the Abate Program under district 15. This is a chance for motorcycle enthusiasts to distribute toys that have been gathered for children.

On Nov. 5, Manhattan Town Center sponsored Kids Helping Kids, a program involving the Washington Dance Studio.

"We look at it as our kickoff to the holiday season," Crow said.

That kickoff helped raise a little under $4,000.

Sony PlayStation 2 tops list of holiday gifts

STORY BY NICK BRATKOVIC ■ PHOTOS BY MATT STAMEY

The time for Tickle Me Elmo and Furby is long gone. This Christmas season, the gift every child must have is a Sony PlayStation 2.

The game system is the gift of choice this holiday season, as a supply shortage has caused the new game system to be placed in high demand. The item tops a list of wanted gifts on the Yahoo.com Web site, and the Christmas lists of Randy McKee's children.

"My older son wants a telescope and a PlayStation 2," McKee, a Montgomery City, Mo., resident said while shopping at Oak Park Mall.

"He has got a PlayStation, but he thinks he needs a PlayStation 2. He is probably going to stay with his PlayStation for a while."

McKee said he remembers his childhood and recalls how the high price gift on his list was less than today.

"I was lucky to get anything over $50," he said. "Now, I heard on eBay they are selling PlayStation 2s for $800."

As of Sunday night, the game systems were being auctioned off on the eBay Web site in a range of $500 to $800. However, exact prices of the system are difficult to judge because they are sold at the auction or market price.

Robin Harmon, manager of a Kay Bee Toy Store in Shawnee, Kan., said it appears a lot of people are waiting until a greater demand is available.

"I actually don't think I have had one person ask me about it, because they know it is just too hard to get," Harmon said. "I really think Sony underestimated the demand for them."

Harmon, who has worked in the toy industry for the last 10 years, said historically it has been the toys that implement technology that have had the greatest demand.

Harmon said that customers in years past have put the blame for the lack of supply on the store for hot holiday gift items, but she said the store has little control.

"People think that it's us, but economically that doesn't make a lot of sense," she said. "Because if you had 1 million of a product that you could sell, you would want to sell them all. Why would you not want to sell them?"

Other gifts that top this year's list have one thing in common; they do something.

"Anything that talks or has a function," she said.

Also

topping wish lists this Christmas are Techno Dogs and scooters that fold up and fit into a backpack. Kevin Olson, store manager of Kay Bee Toys in Manhattan Town Center, said Techno Dogs have evolved from previous popular toys.

"It is the latest of the electronic pets like the Furby that appeal to boys and girls," he said. "They are also toys that adults like."

Olson said another item the store is constantly selling are the foldable scooters. The scooters run from $80 to $100, and have been a popular item that shoppers over the holiday weekend purchased quickly.

The presence of popular toys made shopping much simpler for Winona Beauford, Kansas City, Mo., resident, as she shopped for her children over Thanksgiving break.

"Anything with Dragonball Z," she said. "Pokémon is out. I just figured out what a Pokémon was and now it is Dragonball Z."

While not one of Beauford's favorite toys, Pokémon, along with X-Men and Tickle Me Elmo were also on Yahoo.com's list of hot holiday toys.

While the trend has gone away from the generic action figures of the past, Harmon said there is still a place for Barbie and GI Joe.

"There is always going to be those," she said.

"That company has the market cornered when it comes to those gifts."

CLOCKWISE FROM ABOVE: Techno Dogs, Sony PlayStation 2 and scooters are among the items most in demand for the holiday season.

The Mayor's Holiday Tree at Triangle Park in Aggieville will be lit tonight. The ceremony is scheduled to begin at 8.

HOLIDAY MISSION

Organizations help less fortunate with local programs for food, gifts

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

While many Manhattan residents will spend Christmas with their loved ones participating in the season's traditions, others will see the holiday come and go without much to celebrate.

However, Manhattan's Flint Hills Breadbasket Community Food Network is on a mission to change all of that, Executive Director Shirley Bramhall said.

Part of that plan is a large Christmas tree standing in Aggieville's Triangle Park to signify the beginning of the organization's Holiday Food and Fun drive, a tree that Bramhall said symbolizes more than just the holidays.

"It is a symbol of giving in the community," she said. "It's there to remind all of us that there are other people who are not quite as fortunate as some of us, and to remind us to share not just during the holiday season, but all year round."

The Mayor's Holiday Tree is a symbol of the Holiday Food and Fun drive that brings in the majority of the Breadbasket's total intake during the year, Bramhall said.

"It's the lifeblood of what we do down here. We receive the majority of our funding, probably 90 percent, during this time of the year," she said. "Since 1986, it has always been that way."

Bramhall said she attributes the increase in giving during November and December to Manhattan residents' heightened sense of hospitality during the holiday season.

"It's the way we are — this is the time of year that everyone likes to give and help out," she said.

Unlike other events sponsored by the Breadbasket that help to support 13 Kansas counties, all of the food gathered during the holiday drive stays in Manhattan, Bramhall said.

"All of the food that we collect here stays here," she said.

Since the program's beginning in 1986, the holiday food drive has expanded to include more volunteers to help a growing number of needy people in the Manhattan area, Bramhall said.

According to the organization's Web site, the Mayor's Holiday Tree effort gathered more than 2 million pounds of food in the past 11 years, enough to feed more than 20,000 families.

Recent success has given Manhattan residents even more to celebrate, and although many people are still in danger of going hungry due to poverty, the organization's goal is to minimize the danger through the distribution of available food and to nurture projects that will help alleviate hunger and poverty.

K-State items top list of local gifts

Gameday Santa is sold exclusively at Varney's for $45.95.

Wildcat merchandise items are popular ideas for Christmas presents. "So far we have had many customer requests for K-State items," said Tina Stoller, clothing and gift buyer for the K-State Union Bookstore.

Apparel and jewelry are the top gift items during the Christmas buying rush.

"The trendy things are popular with the students," Stoller said. "Clothing in more trendy colors sells well with the students."

Barb Ohlde, men and boy's department manager for Wal-Mart, said the success of the football team contributes to the popularity of K-State items.

"We see many purchases of the school's items all through December, even after the games are over," she said. "It all depends on how well the football team does."

Leah Sobba, apparel and gift manager for Varney's Book Store, said she agrees that the football team helps in the popularity of K-State purchases.

"K-State items have always sold really well at Christmas time, especially when the football team goes to a bowl game," she said.

However, Stoller said the popularity of K-State merchandise is not based solely on the success of the football team.

"There are a lot of K-State fans, loyal alumni and students loyal to their school that want to show their loyalty and support through the purchases of purple items," Stoller said.

Apparel is not the only popular K-State items at Varney's.

"The fleece blankets are doing well, collectible Santas and jewelry," Sobba said. "Just about anything purple sells."

Ohlde said K-State coffee mugs and car flags are popular items at Wal-Mart.

"I think just about anything with a Wildcat on it is going to sell," she said.

Lights, decorations add flair for holiday season

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA
Kansas State Collegian

It is beginning to look a lot like Christmas for four roommates who live at 606 Vattier St.

With festive stickers on the windows, mistletoe hung in the doorways, garland, lights, bows, stockings and a tree, all put together with a dash of fashion, these women said they decorated their house to bring a little extra holiday spirit into their lives.

"We decided to take a break on the Friday before Thanksgiving and get the place feeling more like a home during the holidays," said Joslin Umberger, graduate student in apparel textile marketing.

This is the first year the women decided to decorate for the season.

Amanda Foulke, senior in speech pathology, estimated each of the four roommates contributed about $20 to the decorating expenses. She said they took a quick trip to Wal-Mart and found everything they needed to make their decorating complete.

Kevin Hartung, Christmas department manager at Wal-Mart, said they offer a variety of popular things to spice up anyone's home for the holidays. He said this year purple decorations have been a hit in Manhattan. Besides decorating the town purple, Hartung said the rustic, outdoorsy decorations have been popular with many customers as well.

Foulke said stringing up Christmas lights is the way to go for people looking for a cheap way to light up their house with holiday cheer.

"Lights are so easy and cheap, and the great thing is you can leave them up all year," Foulke said.

The hip lighting trends this year according to Hartung are the icicle, swag and sculpture lights.

Jerry Hume, owner of Ben Franklin Crafts, said floral bushes and alpine trees have been a common item on many decorators list this season. Hume said these artificial trees are a great investment because they can be kept up year round and one can decorate them differently for each holiday.

Treeless until Sunday night, Foulke said at the last minute they decided to add a fake tree to the house because they said they could not imagine the season without one.

"We all love Christmas so much. It is our favorite holiday," Foulke said. "For us, it is just not Christmas without the tree."

With or without a tree, Hume said even just a little decorating goes a long way and can add the seasonal atmosphere to any living environment.

"Just a little strand of lights or some spray-on snow can put you into the spirit," Hume said.

For those with an urge to decorate but find themselves with a lack of creative drive, Hume said his staff can serve a helpful resource.

"We are all about helping you out," Hume said. "We have booklets and patterns of ways to do creative things. We see lots of creativity, and our staff can really help direct and get those holiday decorating ideas rolling."

Umberger said that regardless of what is trendy, a great way to work with a tight budget and still decorate the house is to borrow old stuff from parents.

"Your parents give you old furniture and dishes," Umberger said. "Why not old Christmas decorations?"

Regardless of what you do to conjure the holiday decorating spirit, Umberger said taking a few minutes to decorate can be a good break from the stresses and strains of school.

"The next three weeks are the hardest, most stressful times of the semester," she said. "It can be so hard to get a focus on Christmas, but when you take a few minutes to liven up the house it really gets you into the spirit."

Quilt panels on display for World AIDS Day

■ Regional AIDS Project sponsor of local showing.

By SARAH BAHARI
Kansas State Collegian

Eunice Dorst and Dru Earls have made it their mission to educate people about AIDS. They want people to know that the epidemic affects everyone — it is not contained in a certain area, gender or race.

"People don't realize there's AIDS in Kansas," said Earls, AIDS education and prevention specialist for the Regional AIDS Project. "It knows no social or ethnic boundaries."

"A lot of people don't seem to understand this."

With this in mind, the Regional AIDS Project has decided to bring the AIDS Memorial Quilt to Manhattan. It will be on display today through Saturday at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building and next week at Moore Hall.

The quilt's arrival is timely, Earls said, because Friday is World AIDS Day — a day to remember lost loved ones and the importance of education and prevention.

There will be eight panels in Manhattan, each containing about eight people, Earls said. There are 43,000 panels worldwide.

Dorst, executive director of the AIDS project, said she can not know the number of people in Riley County with the virus because that information is confidential.

"We don't know the number of people infected with HIV or AIDS locally," she said. "We do know it's a lot higher than people think."

In addition to the quilt viewing, there will be a candlelight walk beginning at Triangle Park and ending at the ECM building, which will include a short memorial service.

There will also be a video, "Living with AIDS," shown during viewing hours. It was produced in conjunction with K-State and features a local person, who has since died, talking about his life after being infected with HIV.

Three of the quilt's panels will be coming to campus next week. Stacie Morrison, resident assistant for Moore Hall, said it will be on display at Moore Hall, but the times have not yet been determined.

Morrison said she hopes to show the quilt from about 5 to 9 p.m. Monday through Friday and for a couple of hours in the afternoon, but it depends on how many volunteers sign up.

"We just need people to sit there and monitor activity around the quilt," she said. "We need about 20 or 30 people."

The quilt has grown since its beginning more than 10 years ago. Earls said. A group of people in San Francisco, who had lost friends to AIDS, wanted to keep their memories alive and educate people, so they began a quilt, Earls said. It is now sponsored and kept by the NAMES Project in San Francisco.

The last time the AIDS quilt was in Manhattan was 1998, when it came to various buildings on campus. Morrison said she hopes for the same kind of success.

Educating people about the reality of this disease is the goal of the Regional AIDS Project and the AIDS quilt, Dorst said.

"So many people feel AIDS has nothing to do with Kansas," she said. "We try to make people realize, 'Yes, it's really here. Yes, it is a problem.'"

GO SEE IT

The panels will be on display at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. today, from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Friday and from noon to 7 p.m. Saturday.

Col. Joyce Napier, a battalion commander at Fort Riley, does a coordination supply support activity Wednesday afternoon. Only 7 percent of the battalion commanders in the United States are female. Below: Napier looks at a map to review operation orders for combat service support mission execution. Napier is in charge of the welfare and guidance of 900 soldiers and 53 officers.

Colonel finds success in male-dominated field

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Joyce Napier's platoon was deployed to Germany in 1980. Only 21 years old at the time, she was put in charge of $4 million in equipment and 80 U.S. soldiers.

"This is the only profession you can go into where if you work hard and perform well then you will succeed and be paid as much as your male counterparts," she said.

Col. Napier's military career has progressed considerably since her experience 20 years ago. She now is a battalion commander at Fort Riley. Only 7 percent of these United States commanders are females.

First Lt. Kristi Mouw, in charge of personnel, said it is rare to hear of a female battalion commander.

"When we heard that a female battalion commander was coming in, there was a stigma attached to it," Mouw said. "It was good to see a female that was very good at her job."

Napier's work in a male-dominated field has not kept her from reaching her goals. The position places Napier in charge of the welfare and guidance of 900 soldiers and 53 officers.

"Initially, you have a wall to leap over that men don't have," she said. "As a female, I can do my job just as well because of my specialty."

Women are limited to certain positions in the military and are not allowed to participate in combat, Napier said. She said she agrees with the Army's policy, but she said women play a vital role.

This is Part Two of a three-part series taking an in-depth look at women's roles in local military.

Society is becoming more accepting of women in the Army, Napier said. She said women are breaking barriers and earning new opportunities.

"I attribute that not only to society changing but to those women proving themselves," she said.

As a captain in the Army, Hollie Martin, who has been in the military for about seven years, said Napier's success has given her hope. She said the battalion commander position is not an easy task.

"She's a great role model," Martin said. "I know she's had to come a long way competing with males."

"It gives you more confidence because she's going to be behind you 100 percent."

Napier said her position influences younger females. She said women realize that upper-level positions in the Army are attainable.

Many women, Napier said, need to know the army is a safe environment and a good career for financial stability and early retirement. She said it is the best profession for women to gain leadership and management experience.

One main concern many women have is their femininity, Napier said. To be a successful leader, she said it is necessary that women do not lose their feminine qualities.

Martin said the only disadvantage some women might encounter is the inability to raise a family. She said the deployment every two years to a foreign country is sometimes hectic. Forty-eight percent of her graduating class at West Point Military Academy no longer serve.

"Instead of staying in, they would rather get out and have a family," she said. "You really have to be willing to give a lot and be patient."

Napier, though, was able to balance family life with the army. Along with her husband, Dennis, she said she was able to raise her stepson while overseas.

Dennis Napier said his wife has been the family's mainstay.

"She's the one that has put all this together," he said. "My take on family is the woman is the glue — the one that holds everything."

Department to construct grain center

By SHANNON MARSHALL
Kansas State Collegian

A dream is soon to become a reality for some members of the Department of Grain Sciences and Industry.

The dream was a facility that would allow the department to research and perform experiments with value-added grain processing in order to attach additional value to Kansas grain products.

The reality is the Bioprocessing and Industrial Value Added Center, projected to make its appearance at K-State in the next two to three years.

The new center will be one of five new buildings in a 16-acre complex to be built east of the white grain buildings on Kimball Avenue.

Stephen Graham, assistant to the dean and director of K-State Research and Extension, said the new center will provide testing facilities which will allow researchers to study different value-added techniques used in wet milling, extrusion processing of grains and fermentation.

"Value added" is a term used to describe finding additional uses for grain. Using grain products as a substitute for petroleum is an example of value-added processing.

"Many people do not realize that most things that are made with petroleum can be made by extracting chemicals from grains and substituting them for petroleum," Graham said.

He said this value-added processing is environmentally friendly. Additionally, he said the center will help the state of Kansas by adding extra value to yearly grain crops, which will in turn create new jobs and eventually improve

Former astronaut to present lecture

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Albert Sacco Jr., former astronaut and chemical engineer, will deliver the inaugural lecture in the Eyestone Distinguished Lecture Series, sponsored by the K-State College Of Engineering.

Sacco will discuss "Living and Working in Space — A Scientist's/Teacher's Perspective" at 4:30 p.m. today in Fiedler Hall Auditorium.

"I plan to gear my lecture more towards what it really means to be an astronaut and then touch a little on the science aspect," Sacco said. "I think most of the audience will be more interested in the space flight than in science, but I want them to understand we are doing the science for a reason. It is a very important reason. It better be because you are risking your life for it."

Sacco trained and flew in two space flights, the first in 1991 and the second in 1995. In 1995, Sacco flew as a payload specialist for 16 days in orbit aboard the space shuttle Columbia.

"Columbia is the oldest shuttle in the fleet that is still active," Sacco said. "We were the 18th flight of the shuttle."

Both flights were science missions, and the 1995 mission focused on materials science, biotechnology, combustion science and fluid physics.

"We mainly grew different crystals," he said. "One was the HIV virus and others included a crystal that helped us understand gasoline production. The better the crystal, the more gasoline you can produce per barrel of oil. It helped us understand concepts like that."

Sacco flew with a total of seven in the Columbia flight crew, five men and two women. Four of the crew had a strong background in science and three were primary pilots. The group trained for two years together before the launch.

Local suspect arrested Wednesday in rape case

A Riley County resident was arrested for charges of rape Wednesday morning, a Riley County police officer said.

Alonzo Hill, 517 S. 15th St., Apt. C, was arrested at his home Tuesday, said Sgt. Lynette Woods of the Riley County Police Department. Woods said the victim, a Manhattan woman, had filed the rape charges Nov. 14.

Charges were not brought against Hill until Wednesday because up to this point, he was only a suspect in the case. After further investigation by the RCPD, a warrant and charges were brought for Hill's arrest, Woods said.

Of all the crimes reported in Riley County, this will be the 34th reported sex offense in the county, Woods said.

Graves dismisses notion of Cabinet appointment

TOPEKA — Gov. Bill Graves insists he's not expecting a job offer from George W. Bush, and speculation appears to be waning now that the Texas governor has claimed victory in the presidential race.

For months, Kansas Republicans talked about the possibility that Graves would be offered a Cabinet post, such as secretary of transportation, in a Bush administration.

Graves' friendship with the Bush family goes back two decades, long before Bush was elected governor in 1994. However, Graves has dismissed talk of a Washington, D.C., appointment, and there's been no suggestion from the Bush camp that an offer is coming.

"I don't hear any talk about it any more," said Pete McGill, a Topeka lobbyist who was chairman of Bush's Kansas campaign.

The speculation about Graves' future began, partly, because of his relationship with the Bush family. Since the Nov. 7 election and ongoing legal dispute surrounding voting in Florida, Graves has participated in two Sunday strategy teleconferences with Bush aides.

In 1980, Graves worked for the aborted presidential campaign of the Texas governor's father, Ronald Reagan won the GOP nomination and the presidency that year.

Both Graves and the Texas governor won their first terms in the same year.

Yet Graves has consistently dismissed the notion that his personal ties to Bush will result in an offer.

Graves has repeatedly said he wants to finish out his second term, and his daughter, Katie, has started preschool.

Also, Graves believes other GOP governors — Frank Keating of Oklahoma and Marc Racicot of Montana have been mentioned prominently in national circles — are higher on the list.

McGill said he believes Graves already has let Bush know he isn't interested in a job.

"Now, two years from now, he may consider an ambassadorship or some other appointment," McGill said of Graves.

Parents of Columbine killers ask for settlement

DENVER — The parents of the Columbine High School gunmen and one of the people who supplied them with weapons have offered a $1.6 million settlement to dozens of victims and their families.

The money, apparently to come from homeowners' insurance policies, could be divided among as many as 37 families of those killed or injured in the deadliest school shooting in U.S. history.

The offer was contained in a Nov. 20 letter sent by C. Michael Montgomery on behalf of the families of gunmen Eric Harris and Dylan Klebold and Mark Manes, who supplied one of their guns.

"The offer is contingent upon the settlement fully and finally resolving all of the claims of all of the victims and victims' families to whom the offer is being made," said the letter, obtained Tuesday by some Denver media.

The settlement parties could include 13 victims' families represented by a group of attorneys led by Stephen Wahlberg, six families represented by attorney James Rouse, and 18 families who haven't filed claims, according to the letter.

The letter was sent in response to a Sept. 25 request from lawyers representing wounded students Sean Graves and Lance Kirklin for about $3 million in insurance coverage from the Harris, Klebolds and three other defendants.

Wahlberg's clients and other plaintiffs have until Dec. 22 to file final amended lawsuits in federal court.

Harris and Klebold killed 12 students and one teacher before killing themselves during a rampage at the school April 20, 1999. Nearly two dozen others were injured.

Local Show hosts compile CD featuring Midwest bands

■ 'Radio Rage' features 22 tracks from Midwest acts familiar to students.

By SARAH MCCAFFREY
Kansas State Collegian

After nine months of meticulous planning and hard work, Jeff Bilberry and Dave Studnicka finally got to see the birth of their creation.

The two hosts of KSDB-FM 91.9's the Local Show have finished their local music compilation compact disc, "Radio Rage."

"It was basically a spur-of-the-moment thing we wanted to do before we got out of college," said Studnicka, senior in geography and trombone player for Ruskabank.

The CD features music from Midwest bands including Pomeroy, Ruskabank, Ultimate Fakebook, Flybox and Sharkey's Little Groove Box. There are 22 tracks on the CD from 21 different bands.

"Radio Rage" started out as recordings of live performances from bands that were guests on the local music show, but quickly developed into a much larger project.

"It has probably become one of the biggest compilation CDs in the Midwest in a long time," said Bilberry, senior in advertising and member of Ruskabank.

"Radio Rage" does include songs that were recorded on the local music show, and it also has studio tracks done by the bands.

One of the obstacles Bilberry and Studnicka said they encountered was getting funding for their project. To cover the production costs of the CD, the duo had two benefit concerts last spring and sought out commercial sponsors.

The money raised from the benefit concerts and the backing of the sponsors enabled them to make 2,000 copies of the CD available to the public. Once the 2,000 CDs are sold, additional copies will be available at MP3.com.

"Radio Rage" features several tracks that were previously unreleased. The songs from Pomeroy, Ruskabank and Ultimate Fakebook are tracks that are not featured on any of the bands' previous CDs.

Bilberry and Studnicka said they originally planned to release the CD in mid-September, but they ran into several delays. Many of the bands didn't have the songs they wanted to use for the CD recorded in time for the September deadline.

Studnicka said the CD release was also delayed, because they worked on it during the summer, when many of the people in the bands or that were working with the CD already had left Manhattan.

■ RADIO RAGE is available at Hastings and Streetside Records

Once the CDs were produced the supplier mistakenly sent them to Oregon rather than Manhattan. After the mistake was discovered, the CDs were sent to Kansas City instead of Manhattan. The CDs finally arrived on Bilberry's doorstep Monday.

Bilberry said producing "Radio Rage" was a beneficial experience for everyone that was involved. He said the bands featured on the CD got to know one another from working on the CD and the benefit concerts.

Bilberry said the CD allows bands that don't have recorded material to use the CD as a demo recording for their resumes.

Studnicka said another advantage is that the CD can help spread the bands' names to different areas in the Midwest because it also features bands from Oklahoma, Nebraska and Iowa.

Studnicka said his passion for local music is one of the reasons why they wanted to make the CD.

"We wanted to try to do one that came off really well and was, most of all, free to the bands," he said.

Concerts to promote compiled CD

By SARAH MCCAFFREY

Aggieville will experience a little "Radio Rage" this week.

Two concerts slated for the end of this week are a part of the album release party for the local compilation "Radio Rage."

The first of the release parties will be tonight at Silverado Saloon with the doors opening at 8. The concert features Pomeroy, Ruskabank and Brothers From Different Mothers.

The second release party will be 10 p.m. Friday at Elements of Taste. The Pemberton's featuring Bro, Egomaniacs and Sense of Self will be performing. Both shows are open to anyone over 18.

Free copies of "Radio Rage" and T-shirts will be given to the first 150 people at each show.

Dave Studnicka, senior in geography, trombone player for Ruskabank and host of the Local Music Show on KSDB-FM 91.9, said the concerts would appeal to different crowds in Manhattan. He said tonight's show has more of a hip-hop, punk and ska style, whereas Friday's show is more of an indie rock grouping.

Matt Maron, Pomeroy guitarist and vocalist, said the band was excited to perform in Manhattan again. Pomeroy is trying to raise money from the show Thursday and the earlier performances this week to fix the RV used for touring.

"The only place you can come close to generating that kind of money is our hometown of Manhattan," Maron said.

Maron said another reason for having multiple concerts was to give fans a chance to see the band play.

"The last time we played Silverado's, they weren't letting any more in and there was still a line around the block," he said.

Get educated; make effort to view AIDS quilt

Someone contracting HIV, which can result in the diagnosis of AIDS, seems like something that could not happen in a small community in Kansas. But it has and it can.

An important step in preventing the contraction of HIV occurs in the form of education. Everyone can become more educated on this subject.

An eye-opening way to realize at least a fraction of the effect that AIDS has is by viewing a portion of the AIDS quilt. Today this can be done from 9 a.m. to 9 p.m. in the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building.

It is important that people take time out of their busy schedules of classes, tests and jobs to reflect on those who have died from AIDS.

The United States definitely is not the only country that has suffered from this tragic epidemic. According to the Web site hivinsite.ucsf.edu, in some countries, over a third of 15-year-olds might die from AIDS.

The Web site states there are an estimated 34.3 million adults and children living with HIV/AIDS worldwide. This is only an attempt at the actual numbers, since there are some people who do not even know they have HIV or AIDS.

Do your part. Read as much information and literature on the subject as you can. Become active in groups that promote an awareness of this virus that can be deadly.

By doing your part, maybe someday we can stop adding to the quilt.

your mortar board in the air is a rite of passage for all, and there couldn't be a much better time to do so.

Look around — there are rolling masterpieces everywhere. Sports cars have made a roaring comeback after a lot of them were sent out to pavement in the mid-90s. Retro is back — from the badges on the sheet metal to the door handles and from the wheels to the whole design of the vehicle. Hell, Volvo is even making cars that aren't square.

They're still designed to run into a wall. They just don't look that way anymore.

Cars and trucks are producing horsepower numbers not seen since the muscle car era, while emitting about 95 percent less emissions. Cars have style and flair. Not just high-priced cars, but affordable cars like the Chrysler PT Cruiser, Volkswagens New Beetle and taken to the extreme, Pontiac's (what the hell were we inhaling when we designed this?) Aztec.

As a car guy, I already am overwhelmed with the car and truck choices I will be faced with when I finally graduate. It would be hard enough to choose now with vehicles like the PT Cruiser, Dodge Neon ACR, Subaru Impreza 2.5 RS, Ford Focus ZTS, Jeep Wrangler Sport, and any Volkswagen wearing a 1.8T or a VR6 badge. These cars represent an exceptionally high fun-to-drive-affordable bang-per-buck ratio.

As if decision making wasn't difficult enough now, there are several new and or improved cars coming to market next year. The famous Mini-Cooper is all-new for the first time in its 41-year history, thanks to BMW, and it will see U.S. shores for the first time since 1967. Who wouldn't want a car that weighs barely more than a ton with more than 150 horsepower from a supercharged engine? Consider my name on the waiting list.

Chrysler might build a turbocharged GT version of the PT Cruiser, and Subaru will introduce a turbocharged Impreza to our shores for the first time, the WRX. This is a car that's ultimately designed for driving sideways on an unpaved road at speeds that will curl your eyelids. Here's another waiting list my name needs to find a way onto.

One car I'm keeping my fingers crossed on is the

The vehicles I've mentioned have a high grin factor. Driving these vehicles will cause the person behind the wheel to wear a wide ass grin. But then again, for some of you, driving a new car, even if it's a Daewoo would put a grin on your face.

These vehicles are among the best in terms of style, performance and, most importantly, the fun-to-drive and grin factors. There are many more vehicles that a lack of space does not allow me to mention. I hope I have motivated some of you to study a little more. And maybe, just maybe, I've gotten cars out of my brain long enough so I can concentrate on the remainder of the semester. Happy motoring.

Column criticism more useful without insults

Every weekday, two opinionated people deliver a brief, or sometimes not so brief, point of view. We do this for a number of reasons ranging from a need to produce public awareness to the overwhelming need to see our name in print. For whatever reason, we diligently produce a column full of heartfelt commentary meant to provoke some thought from the reader.

Writers live for feedback. We want to hear that the latest column helped you understand something, helped you realize you were right all along, or was a giant lump of fetid compost. Criticism is just as important as praise.

If you read a column or article and want to communicate with the author, go ahead. We live for that stuff. When the author writes something you agree with, let him or her know. When writers forget to mention something you think is important, e-mail them. When they write something you disagree with completely, tell them.

As often happens when one is a columnist, people disagree with you.

I've gotten a bit of mail this semester, some of it good and some of it bad. I've found even if people disagree with me, if they present their arguments in a well-thought-out way, it still can be a positive experience. If someone presents his or her argument without making a personal attack on me, I will be much more likely to listen to what he or she has to say.

Then there are the occasional missives of a less-than-intellectual nature. For instance, the latest e-mail I was unfortunate to receive based an entire argument on the statement "YOUR FAT." First of all, I would like to thank the author of that e-mail for pointing that out to me. I'm almost positive that I hadn't noticed I was overweight until it was so thoughtfully pointed out to me. Now, I'm going to point out that the preceding was sarcasm, because I have a feeling the author of the e-mail might not be able to pick up on that.

Secondly, with the statement "your fat," the author is implying something about my fat. What about it? Is it bothering him in some way? Is it communicating with him telepathically?

If you feel the need to be personally insulting without the barest hint of a point, at least let someone proofread your insults. It's hard to take someone seriously if I'm rolling around on the floor giggling hysterically.

I'm more than happy to listen to your point of view. Just be kind enough to avoid the personal attacks.

All votes should be counted despite restrictions on time

Editor,

Let me ask you this.

Suppose you were given a test by one of your professors. Your answers on the test were graded by machine. When your answers were processed, the machine registered no grade. This could be a fault with the test, the machine or even your own hands, as you didn't darken the circles well enough to be seen by the machine.

Your professor understands your concerns and, without delay, he feeds your test to the machine again. Once more, your test records no grade. The professor now states your test has been graded twice and you have failed.

No points. Zero. Zip. Would this be fair? Wouldn't you expect the professor to hand-grade your test if you suspected the machine didn't accurately record your answers? Wouldn't that be fair? What if your fellow students complained you shouldn't get a hand-scored grade? Even though you are a good student with high grades in other classes, they insist you deserve the failing grade you received. After all, your score has been counted and recounted.

They claim you are holding up the progress of the class with your complaint that the process is flawed. They call you a whiner. Would you concede and take the failure? Would you consider yourself a loser? I bet you would take matters out of the classroom and complain to the administration. All you want is a fair grade, and I bet you would fight for it.

Let's be fair. Let's count EVERY vote.

Enforcement of attendance policy needed for offenders

Editor,

In my experience taking classes at K-State, I have run across professors who are lax in their attendance policies, as well as those who enforce it strictly. I agree with Natalie Walter that attendance rules should be posted in the course syllabus distributed at the beginning of the class. I would take that one step further and have the professor explain attendance rules on the first day of class.

I disagree with Walter that a professor should not be able to ask someone to leave class for being late. In the years I've been here, I've noticed it's generally the same people who are late to class every day. As adults, barring something out of the ordinary (car problems, weather, etc.), we should be responsible enough to show up on time. It disrupts class when someone is significantly late or if they leave significantly early. It also is a distraction to other students.

I think it's only fair to enforce these attendance policies with repeat offenders. A person may be legitimately late once or twice. Beyond that, I don't have much sympathy.

Katie Theobald, 5, of Manhattan, examines the Mayor's Holiday Tree with her mother, Jodi, after the tree lighting ceremony Wednesday evening, which was put on by the Flint Hills Breadbasket and the Aggieville Business Association.

Citywide fund raising begins

By TRAVIS HOCHARD
Kansas State Collegian

The Mayor's Holiday Tree Lighting Ceremony signifies the real beginning of the holiday season, Karen McCulloh, Manhattan mayor, said.

"More importantly, it brings people together to help raise food and money for underprivileged families in Manhattan," she said.

The tree lighting ceremony Wednesday evening was put on by the Flint Hills Breadbasket and the Aggieville Business Association.

Paul Van Nostran, chairman of the Flint Hills Breadbasket, said he has been volunteering for the organization for many years now.

"More than 11,000 people depend on the drive as a partial, if not substantial, part of their survival," Nostran said.

Boxes were placed around the park for donations and can be found at other various sites in Manhattan throughout the holiday season.

"The drive is doing very well, but we still need your help," McCulloh said.

Before the lighting, the Ballard Memorial Arbor was dedicated to Sonny Ballard and his father, Charles. Members of the Ballard family were at the dedication, including Sheryl Ballard, widow of Sonny Ballard.

"In memory of Charles and Sonny. Please know — because we do — that Aggieville is a better place because you were here," Ballard said. "For many years Sonny was a thorn to the Manhattan city government, but a thorn always protects a rose, and that rose is Aggieville."

Before the dedication, the K-State Choir performed Christmas carols including "We Wish you a Merry Christmas" and "Up on the House Top."

The Hospitality Management Society served sugar cookies and hot apple cider to the nearly 100 Manhattan residents who attended the ceremony.

Chris Beetles, senior in hotel and restaurant management, is the president of HMS. This was his third year to help with the Mayor's Holiday Tree lighting.

"It's a good way for us to get involved with the community," he said. "We have fund-raisers throughout the year, but this is the time when people really come together."

Domino's gives money to schools

By NANCY HULL
Kansas State Collegian

Three former K-State students have devised a plan to make significant improvements in the Wichita school district, and the plan revolves around one thing: pizza.

These students left K-State behind in June after devising a plan to help four struggling Domino's Pizza stores in Wichita.

While working part-time at Domino's in Manhattan, they approached the store's owner with a plan to run the Wichita stores. If they received 80 percent of the stores' profits, they promised to give 20 percent of their share to Wichita's school district.

And they've stuck to their plan. The trio, consisting of James Sperman, Travis Volz and Dave Darling, teamed with 13-year Domino's veteran Ed Christiansen, and the stores' sales tripled after their first week in town.

Their proposal to give the Wichita school board monthly checks with no strings attached is expected to be signed, Sperman said.

"The response from everyone in the community has been somewhere between tremendous and overwhelming," he said.

When the three men left Manhattan, they were confident they could pull the stores out of debt.

"We're not the skeptical type," Sperman said.

The three young men drastically increased profits in an unusual way.

"Basically, we made complete fools out of ourselves," Sperman said.

They stood on tables by the street, hollered and waved down traffic. Five hours a day were spent handing out coupons, and they distributed more than 50,000 door hangers. They also managed to work 12 hours a day in the stores.

"It was all for a good cause, so I didn't feel so tired," Sperman said.

"It all boiled down to we just cared."

Sperman said he hopes the funding given to education will ripple out in society.

"If education improves and kids grow up well, crimes of ignorance will decrease, and it will be a better world," he said.

Sperman's father, a high school mathematics teacher for more than 30 years, has helped Sperman realize the importance of education, he said. Sperman said he has long term hopes of doubling the number of teachers and increasing teaching salaries, in addition to improving the learning environment.

Terry Behrendt, executive director of grants and development services for Wichita Public Schools, said if the contract is signed, it will be an agreement to try the partnership for at least one year. After one year it will be re-evaluated by parents, faculty and the community.

He said the funds will be targeted toward improving performances in reading, writing and mathematics, and the district's superintendent, Winston Brooks, would like to see technological advances.

Behrendt said that to his knowledge Domino's is the first organization to commit profits up front to the community.

"They came forward and said, 'We want to give to education, so we'll give this to you to make useful investments,'" Behrendt said. "That's refreshing."

He said the real power of the partnership can come if other companies see the advantages of it.

"It's great how Sperman and these guys are talking to other organizations about doing the same thing," he said.

The possibility of damaging relationships between the school district and other restaurants is a concern, Behrendt said.

Although Sperman said Domino's sole purpose isn't to gain more customers from the partnership, he does expect sales to continue to increase.

"It's like if you own Kmart, why shop at Wal-Mart? I want the community to know this is their company. They will own 20 percent of it," he said.

Since the partnership is centered around education, Behrendt said he hopes the three men will return to college and finish their degrees.

The former students left school after their third year at K-State. Volz and Darling were business majors, and Sperman was pursuing degrees in math, physics and aerospace engineering. Sperman said that when he feels the stores can be self-sufficient without him, he will take on a supervisor role and would like to return to school within the next couple years.

Darling said he's undecided about returning to college. He said he would return to say he accomplished that goal.

"I grew up in a structured family where school was the way to go," Darling said. "We said no to our parents, and you don't say no to your parents."

But, he said he's always had the mind set that helping people is one of the most important things in life.

"I don't want to go back and waste a year in school if I can help the kids and people here in Wichita," Darling said.

Freshman, senior share intensity in game of volleyball

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Kelle Branting is intense — not just wanting-to-win intense, but in-your-face, scary intense. Yes, scary — Branting takes volleyball, K-State volleyball, very seriously — and especially to a new freshman who plays the same position.

"Sometimes I'm scared — a first impression," freshman middle blocker Lauren Goehring said. "She was the first one I wanted to earn the respect of."

Branting can indeed be intimidating, but the weird thing is, despite that hard-core demeanor on the court, she is a devoted friend off the court, one who will be missed very much, after she finishes out her senior campaign and the upcoming NCAA Tournament, junior setter Disney Bronnenberg said.

"She was the first person I roomed with my freshman year. While she scared me at first, we're going to be missing her a whole lot. I'm going to miss her an awful lot," she said. "It's definitely going to be the hardest thing for me since I've been at K-State to see Kelle go."

"I think with Kelle, Kelle's got so many plans for the future. In her life she's just very ambitious, and I've become so close to Kelle."

So too with Goehring. She and Branting might be very different people, but they both respect and like each other, the freshman said.

"She's a team leader, and she's vocal with it, which is good for our team because we need people on the court to lead, and people to be vocal leaders," Goehring said. "And she's a vocal leader and she leads by example, so we all look to her."

Not that Goehring is too weak to stand on her own, though. Before playing for K-State, she was a member of the gold-medal winning U.S. Youth National Team. Goehring is intense, just not in the same way as Branting, she said.

"I'm intense, but I think we're intense a little bit different, but we both want to win. She's really vocal

K-State volleyball team headed to weekend NCAA Tournament

Friday will be a coming home party of sorts for head coach Jim McLaughlin.

K-State's fourth-year man will be making a trip back to his native city of Malibu, Calif., when his 24th-ranked Wildcats compete in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

The Cats will face Loyola-Chicago at 5 p.m. PST/7 p.m. CST Friday at the Firestone Fieldhouse on the campus of tournament host Pepperdine University. McLaughlin was a former men's assistant coach at Pepperdine from 1986 to '89, helping the Waves win the '86 NCAA title.

K-State received a large bid into the 2000 tournament and a fifth-seed in the Midwest Regional after posting a 20-8 overall record and a 14-6 mark in the Big 12, good for a three-way tie for second place in the conference with Missouri and Texas A&M.

"Our intensity level has gotten better and better and better as the season's gone, and I think that's why we've finished so strong," McLaughlin said.

Meanwhile, Loyola, the Midwestern Collegiate Conference champions, received an automatic bid and a 12th-seed after finishing the 2000 regular season with a 22-8 overall record and an 11-1 mark in league play. The Ramblers are in the midst of a seven-match winning streak, but are 0-2 all-time in the NCAA Tournament. K-State is 3-4.

A Wildcat win over Loyola, who leads the series with K-State 1-0 after a 3-1 victory in 1992, would advance McLaughlin's squad into Saturday's second round game versus the winner of fourth-seed Pepperdine and 13th-seed Fairfield.

The Cat coach likes his chances, too, because he Women's team vies for wins at Classic

Deb Patterson will be looking for answers this weekend, when the Wildcats look to extend their streak of dominance in the sixth annual Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic at Bramlage Coliseum.

"There are some questions that we want answered," the head coach said. "I want to see consistency, and this is a great opportunity to establish that."

That lack of consistency was evident in last weekend's Beaver Classic in Corvallis, Ore., as Wyoming handed the Cats their first loss of the season, a 73-70 overtime battle that freshman Nicole Ohlde said was tough to handle.

"It hurts when you lose," she said. "It was a long night, and we had to think about it the whole time, but we knew we had to come back the next day. You have to remember that loss, but you also have to forget about it and move on."

Ohlde sparked K-State with 36 points and 19 boards, but her teammates seemed out of sync, as the Cats shot just 2-for-22 from beyond the three-point arc and turned the ball over 28 times on the night.

However, K-State seemed to pull it together and show resiliency in the consolation game the next night, leaving the Classic with a third-place finish after beating Princeton, 63-51.

Patterson said she was happy with the way her team regrouped after the Wildcats' tough loss the night before.

"I was really pleased with the way we bounced back against Princeton," she said. "The thing I was most pleased with was the changes we made from the first to second half. We didn't defend well in the first half, but we addressed that, and we came back and held them to 18 points in the second half."

Consistency is something Patterson's young squad has struggled with so far this season, she said, but a week of practice should go a long way in establishing that wrinkle in the Cats' game.

"I am really looking for a ball club to come out this weekend and from half-to-half and from game-to-game work to be the same throughout," Patterson said.

K-State traditionally has had its way in the Wildcat Classic, winning the tournament four of its first five years, including two consecutive first-place finishes in 1998 and 1999.

Senior Kim Woodlee said she is happy to be back in the friendly confines of Bramlage Coliseum after a Thanksgiving road trip to the Pacific Northwest.

"We're looking forward to getting into our own tournament — it will be great to play at home again," Woodlee said. "We get up for this; we don't want people coming into our house and pushing us around."

To avoid that, though, Woodlee and the Cats will have to bring their A-game Friday night against a physical 3-1 Texas Southern team. Patterson said. The Tigers are led by sophomore forward Tashandrea Smith, who averages 11 points and eight boards per contest.

Patterson is enthused with the way her team is coming together at this point in the season and said this weekend should be a challenging tournament for everyone.

"It's an exciting time for us," she said. "I'm really looking forward to being back in Bramlage and getting some more experience with this young ball club."

INFO

Second-round tip times for the Commerce Bank Classic have been switched to accommodate K-State fans wishing to cheer on the Wildcats in their bid for the Big 12 Football Championship. The women now are slated to play at 5 p.m. Saturday, regardless of Friday's outcome against Texas Southern.

Women's equestrian teams hope to move up in rankings after month off

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State women's equestrian looks to move up in the regional standings this weekend after having over a month off.

The team will travel to Texas A&M in College Station, Texas, for a two-English show Saturday and a two-western show Sunday, both starting at 8 a.m. They will compete against Oklahoma State, Sul Ross State, Texas A&M, Texas Tech and West Texas A&M.

"We're definitely looking forward to Texas A&M and looking forward to beating West Texas A&M," Kara Nielsen, Western rider, said.

West Texas A&M dominated the two Western meets they were host to earlier this season, winning four of the five shows that K-State competed in.

"We are not that far behind Texas A&M and Oklahoma State, but West Texas is way out in front of everybody in Western competition," head coach Teresa Slough said.

In the Zone 7, Region 2 standings, West Texas A&M is first with 125 points, followed by Texas A&M with 90, Oklahoma State's 85 and K-State with 82 points in the eight-team region.

"They have an upper hand on their own horses," Nielsen said. "We have a better chance to rise over them in Texas A&M."

Kelly Gratny, who is riding both English and Western this weekend, said she thinks the break since the last competition has been beneficial. It gave the Wildcats many hours in the saddle to fix small problems and tie up loose ends, before competing in an important meet in terms of regional points.

"We are sitting in a position to do well in the region," Gratny said, "but this weekend is important to move up in the points."

The beginners, who have done well so far this season, Slough said, will continue that trend.

"I look for the four beginners that have 19 or more points to ride well this weekend," Slough said, "along with several others that have done well this season."

"Beth Fountaine and Abby Oldridge have been looking better in practice. Nikki Bredfeldt and Megan Douthitt both have collected a lot of points and are riding well."

Meanwhile, the English team is in second place out of 10 teams in the region with 85 points, five points behind leader Texas A&M. West Texas A&M sits third with 65.

This weekend, Texas A&M has an advantage in being able to ride some of their own horses in the home competition, but knowledge gained from the first meet will help the Wildcats, English coach Mary Ann Thomas Funk said.

"Before the first meet, none of us knew what the quality of the horses would be like," Funk said. "Now, we have a better idea and have been able to practice for that. They do have a distinct advantage of being at home, but our riders are just as good as theirs."

This is the first time the English and Western teams will compete together, which will bring more support to the event this weekend, Funk said.

"The team will be enthusiastic and fired up for this weekend," she said.

Christmas is a time for

Variety of sweet treat shapes, flavors popular during holiday season

Creating the perfect Christmas cookie is as easy as using colored frosting and sprinkles. As for the type of cookie to use, most any kind will do.

"Colors and shapes are what really make it," said Mary Willyard, professor of grain science and industry.

He said the most traditional cookie used is the sugar cookie, which is usually cut into different Christmas shapes. Then those shapes are frosted with bright colors.

"Those are the most popular ways that I have seen," Willyard said.

Those aren't the only ways, though. He said there are a lot of different things that are done in making Christmas cookies.

Willyard said several people choose cookie cutters shapes that are holiday-related, such as trees or stars.

Beside using colored frosting, food coloring could be added to the dough. Red or green are the most popular colors used.

"It's not unusual to roll together red and green dough," he said.

That gives it a red and green swirled look.

Melanie Haines, junior in bakery science, said she and the Bakery Science Club will use some of these decorating ideas when making cookies for their bake sale Wednesday in Shellenberger Hall. She said they will use large cookie cutters to make shapes such as stockings, angels and trees.

Using several different colors of frosting can add to the festivity of the cookies. Haines recommended using different colored frosting on each shape, such as using a different color of frosting for the rim of the stalking.

"They're a lot of fun," she said.

Candy also can be used to decorate.

"The creativity is limitless," Haines said.

For those who don't want to or don't know how to make their own cookies, refrigerated store-bought cookie dough is an option. Willyard said that is not at all unusual, either.

Cookies are not the only holiday food people can make, Willyard said. Some other traditional foods are stollen and pova tica. Stollen is a traditional sheet bread that has a citrus taste to it. Pova tica is also a sheet bread. The dough is rolled out very thin, and then usually filled with butter, brown sugar and finely-ground nuts. It's rolled into a spiral form, cut and served.

"That's a very common ethnic bread in the city," Willyard said. "People of Polish descent usually make that."

No matter what one chooses to make, though, Haines said seeing what the end result is might be the most fun.

"I like seeing what they come out like," she said, "because every one is different, depending on the person and what you have to work with."

Cookie recipes helpful in making treats

Compiled by KRISTEN DYMAK

Basic Sugar Cookies

1/3 cup shortening
1/3 cup margarine
2 cups all-purpose flour, divided
3/4 cup sugar
1 egg
1 T milk
1 T baking powder
1 T vanilla extract

In a large bowl, beat the shortening and margarine with an electric mixer at medium to high speed for about 30 seconds or until softened. Add 1 cup of the flour, sugar, egg, milk, baking powder and vanilla extract and beat until thoroughly combined, scraping the sides of the bowl occasionally. Beat or stir in the remaining flour. Divide the dough in half. Cover and chill for one to two hours or until easy to handle. Roll each portion of the dough to 1/8 inch thickness on a lightly floured surface. Cut into the desired shapes. Place 1 inch apart on an ungreased cookie sheet. If desired, sprinkle with candies or colored sugar before baking. Bake in 375° for 7 to 9 minutes or until the edges are firm and the bottoms are very lightly browned. Remove the cookies and cool on a rack. Makes 3 to 4 dozen cookies.

Mexican Wedding Cakes

2 cups cake flour
1 cup finely chopped nuts
1/2 cup powdered sugar
1 cup real butter
1 T vanilla
1/2 T almond extract

Blend butter, sugar and flour. Add nuts and extracts. Chill. Spoon out teaspoonsfuls and form into small ovals. Place on an ungreased baking sheet. Bake 20 to 25 minutes at 300°. Roll in powdered sugar while still warm.

Peanut Blossoms

1 cup granulated sugar
1 cup packed brown sugar
1 cup butter or margarine
1 cup creamy peanut butter
2 eggs
1/4 cup milk

2 T vanilla
3 1/2 cups all-purpose flour
2 T baking soda
1 T salt
2 10-ounce packages milk chocolate candies

Cream sugars, butter or margarine and peanut butter. Beat in the eggs, milk and vanilla. Sift together flour, soda and salt and then stir into egg mixture. Shape into balls and roll in additional granulated sugar. Place on an ungreased cookie sheet and bake at 375° for 10 to 12 minutes. Immediately press a chocolate candy into each. Makes 7 dozen.

"Besides the intense physical training, we had to learn how to live in space because things are so different," Sacco said. "We trained for 13-15 hours a day to prepare for everything."

A typical day for the team consisted of waking at 5 a.m. and running three to five miles before breakfast. In the morning, they would attend school to learn about the science with which they would be working. After a 30-minute lunch break, they would train again physically until 7 p.m.

"The physical training was done in the gym to help build muscle tone because of the aggressive conditions we had to be ready for," he said.

The team trained for five days a week the first year and then gradually increased it to six and then seven over the final year.

"It became more difficult, but there are so many things we had to perfect," he said. "Even brushing your teeth becomes miserable, and you have to learn to do it in such a way that it doesn't impact what you are there to do."

Sacco said the team not only had to learn the science, but they had to learn to function together in quarters the size of a van.

"Everything was tricky," he said. "The simplest things become difficult but still interesting. For example, we had to learn how to brush our teeth in a whole different way. If you didn't keep your mouth shut, the particles would float around and get on people. Simple things turned tricky."

Sacco also said science in space is different from on earth.

"I learned so much because everything is much, much different," he said. "It is not like doing science here. Surface temperature becomes dominant, and that changes things. If an oily substance gets loose and hits the wall, it will spread like a thin film across the wall."

Sacco said all the training was worth it, though, once he saw the earth from space.

"It is the most beautiful thing," he said. "It is this robin-egg blue color with a high-intensity bulb shining below it to light it up. It's wonderful. On the other side, it is even better. When the sun is blocked, it is the blackest black you have ever seen, like black velvet, with lots of stars all around."

"Picture going out into the country on a clear night and looking up at the stars and then multiplying that by hundreds. It is magnificent."

Sacco also said space flight can be a humbling experience.

"Being out there in the endless space shows how insignificant the earth is in the scheme of things," he said. "And, in turn, that means how insignificant each one of us is."

Sacco said he would like to travel to space again, but some of it depends on how quickly the space station is completed.

"Right now, they are looking for astronauts that can help build the station, not scientists," he said. "I would love to do it again because it is a truly great experience."

Martin said this is encouraging. "She has a family — so it gives me hope that you can work to get those things," Martin said. "She has fought those battles and been successful."

Napier said she has reached her goals, which included having a family. She said she also is a fair leader and mentor.

"You've got to give people the responsibility to see how they perform," she said. "No matter what rank in life you hold you are no better than anyone else."

Greeks consider Homecoming bid changes

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

A proposal before the Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Council could change the Homecoming bidding process for greek houses.

Under the current method, the Homecoming partnerships consist of two fraternities and a sorority. The fraternities mutually decide which other fraternity they will partner with, and then, on an every-other-year basis, the fraternities bid a sorority or vice versa. This process has drawn criticism from the fact that some sororities and fraternities do not feel they have equal footing in the competition either because of their small size or negative reputations within the greek system.

"Though we stress that each house is equal, there are reputations that have been around for years," said Elaine Gruenbacher, Kappa Alpha Theta sorority president. "If two sororities, for instance, end up competing for the same fraternity pairing, reputations can play into that. You don't want it to be a popularity contest, but some sororities might think that it's that way."

Another drawback of the current bidding process is that if fraternity or sororities end up competing with another house for a particular bid, the loser might develop hard feelings, Gruenbacher said.

"That happened my freshman year," she said. "It caused hard feelings between us and that sorority. It didn't affect Homecoming, but it was still bad for the greek system. Anytime you increase the competition between two houses, it's not what we as greeks want. It wasn't long-lasting, but even if it lasts for a few months, it's bad for greeks."

Last year, Alpha Chi Omega sorority dropped out of bidding because its members felt the process was unfair. In an effort to remedy the situation, three proposals have been brought before IFC and Panhellenic, Katie Scheer, Panhellenic president, said.

The first choice is to leave the process as it is. The second is to allow the fraternities to pair as they do, with a pairing member cap of 180 members, and then draw the sorority out of a hat. Fraternities would abide by a courtesy rule that mandates that there be a house wait three years before pairing up with another house for a second time.

The third proposal is to make the entire process completely random, drawing all the houses out of a hat. Fraternities would be classified by their size — small, mid-range or large — and houses from different groups would be paired together to prevent large houses from grouping together.

This final proposal offers the fairest method, Scheer said.

"I personally feel it would benefit the Greek system in the way Homecoming is supposed to," she said. "I think the totally random drawing is the best proposal."

Living with AIDS

STORY BY SARAH BAHARI ■ PHOTOS BY STEVEN DEARINGER

Above: Following a candlelight walk for World AIDS Day, people look at the panels on display at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building. The K-State panel was a signature panel for people to leave a personal note at a previous showing. Top: Linda Kahle, Allison Paulin and Kelly Roberts, all seniors in social work, walk on Anderson Avenue during a candlelight walk in honor of World AIDS Day. The walk started at Triangle Park in Aggieville and concluded at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building. Bottom: State Sgt. Man returns home to battle final stage of disease

Harold Conner has no time to die. There are too many new things to experience, too many people to love and too much work to be done. But Conner is not sure how much longer he will have these opportunities.

At 38 years old, he was recently diagnosed as being in the final stage of AIDS. Conner has been left with no choice but to adjust to an altered lifestyle while preparing for an untimely death.

Before leaving this world, though, he has some goals he hopes to accomplish. Conner spends much of time working on his autobiography, "No Time for Dying," which chronicles his battle with HIV and AIDS and the loss of his partner. He has completed three chapters.

"With a lot of hope, I'll finish it," he said. Another one of Conner's goals is to spread awareness of this disease.

"I'm trying to educate as many people as I can," he said. "It happens everywhere, to anybody, any gender, race, age, sexual orientation."

In Conner's case, he contracted the disease after being raped, he said. He was diagnosed with HIV in 1990 and AIDS in 1991.

To continue educating people, Conner attended the candlelight walk and AIDS quilt viewing Thursday evening at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry building.

Regional AIDS Project aims to educate public

For six years, the Regional AIDS Project has helped people deal with their disease — fighting one prominent obstacle along the way.

"We always have funding problems," Eunice Dorst, executive director of the project, said. "We fight to find money."

Funding has been a constant struggle for the organization, as they have had to eliminate some of their projects due to a lack of money, said Angel Skaggs, outreach specialist and HIV educator.

One of the more well-known projects they took on was Florida vote recount still under debate

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

Al Gore's lawyers battled for his political survival in the Florida and U.S. supreme courts Thursday, pleading against delaying fresh vote recounts "even one day" as a half-million ballots sped by rental truck to Tallahassee. GOP lawmakers jockeyed in the state capital to award the presidency to George W. Bush in case the judges wouldn't.

"When the counting stops, we want to be prepared to lead this nation," Bush said in Texas between transition meetings with retired Gen. Colin Powell — the star of his Cabinet-in-the-making. Officials said the meeting cemented Powell's position as secretary of state in a presumptive Bush administration.

In Florida, the GOP-dominated state Legislature drew a step closer to appointing its own slate of presidential electors as a committee urged leaders to call a special session. Democrats called that a brazen power play, while they worked elsewhere to keep Gore in the game.

Bush, whose brother is governor of the state, raised no objection to the Legislature's actions, and his lawyers defended the lawmakers' right to name a GOP slate. "It's time to get some finality," Bush said in an appearance with Powell at his Crawford, Texas, ranch.

Hundreds of miles away in Florida, Lt. Jim Kersey's squad car headed up the ballot brigade as it passed a handmade sign reading "No chad zone."

Elsewhere lawmakers cussed and fumed in a legislative committee room; the two could-be presidents plotted their transitions to power; legal briefs ricocheted between the nation's courts; and the banana-yellow rental truck — swarmed by police and media vehicles on Ronald Reagan Turnpike — carried contested ballots to Circuit Judge N. Sanders Sauls' court.

The recount convoy was captured by TV cameras in helicopters, giving Americans a birds-eye view all the way from Palm Beach to Tallahassee.

Sauls could need the ballots if he sides with Gore after a hearing Saturday on the merits of recounts

Man arrested in shooting case

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

A Manhattan man was arrested after the Riley County Police Department responded to a call at 11:28 p.m. Wednesday about a shooting on the 800 block of Yuma Street.

According to Sgt. Connie Miller of the RCPD, the victim, Luke M. Johnson, had been shot in the lower part of the body. He was taken to a local hospital, where he was treated and released.

Police traced a car description to Aggieville where, after a short pursuit, Cleven T. Washington, Manhattan, was arrested at 1:30 a.m. for attempted first-degree murder, felony, obstruction, possession of marijuana and driving on a revoked license. He is being kept on a $100,000 bond.

In conjunction with Washington's arrest, two other arrests were made. Thallisha S. Smith was arrested for being an accessory to attempted first-degree murder, possession of cocaine, possession of marijuana and possession of drug paraphernalia. She is being kept on a $20,000 bond. Racheal I'kerd also was arrested for obstruction. She is being kept on a $1,000 bond.

Bowl hotline to begin Sunday for K-State fans

The K-State Alumni Association will open its toll-free bowl hotline beginning at 5 p.m. Sunday, to begin selling official travel packages to the Wildcats' bowl game.

Interested individuals can call the hotline at (800) 985-5231.

All bowl travel packages will include hotel accommodations, both a game ticket and a pregame ticket, and transportation to and from the pep rally, pregame and game. These packages can be purchased with or without charter air service to the bowl city.

Those wishing to make pregame reservations only can call either (800) 600-2586 or 532-6260 (in Manhattan) beginning Monday.

Additional information will be posted as it becomes available. Look in Monday's Collegian or on the Association's Web site: www.K-State.com.

Meanwhile, fans wanting game tickets only can call the KSU Athletic Ticket Office at (800) 221-CATS.

Library tries new hours of operation for finals

Hale Library will be staying open until 2 a.m. to accommodate students studying for finals.

Beginning Sunday, Hale will keep its doors open from 7:30 a.m. to 2 a.m. Monday through Friday, 10 a.m. to 2 a.m. Saturday and 1 p.m. to 2 a.m. Sunday.

Brice Hobrock, dean of K-State libraries, said the library's main purpose is to accommodate students, and that is exactly what they are trying to accomplish.

"The students have requested this for many years," Hobrock said. "Our primary goal is to assess what students need. We are trying to respond to what students say they need."

The extended hours will be until Dec. 14. Hobrock said during the extended time period, access will be limited to the first and second floors. There also will be two security guards on duty.

However, during the extended hours there also will be no library circulation or services available after the normal closing time of 11 p.m.

Hobrock said he has no doubt the extended hours will be successful and that many students will take advantage of the service.

"I think it will be an astonishing thing," he said. "I think we should have done this before."

Hobrock said that at this point, Hale has the shortest hours of any library in the Big 12.

"This is the right thing to do," he said. "I am just sorry that this is so late in coming."

Tanker spill leaves oily mess along Mississippi

NEW ORLEANS — Cleanup crews are working to contain a half-million gallons of crude oil that spilled from a tanker into shellfish beds and bird sanctuaries along the lower Mississippi River.

"We've observed some impact to some birds, such as white pelicans," said Roland Guidry, a state oil spill coordinator.

The Coast Guard closed shipping lanes on a 26-mile stretch of the river below New Orleans after the 800-foot Westchester lost power and ran aground Tuesday night.

Traffic upriver resumed late Wednesday.

The Westchester ran aground at Port Sulphur, about 42 miles south-southeast of New Orleans and 60 miles down the winding river.

The ship lost power when part of the engine exploded. No one was injured. It was en route from Sabine Pass, Texas, to St. James, about 50 miles east of New Orleans.

The vessel's single-hull cargo tank holding about 53,000 barrels of Nigerian crude oil — more than 2.2 million gallons — lost about 13,500 barrels, said Virginia Miller, spokeswoman for the ship's owner and operator.

The river bottom apparently plugged the hole and kept the rest from escaping, Miller said.

The 567,000-gallon spill is the largest in U.S. waters since the Exxon Valdez dumped more than 10 million gallons of oil in Prince William Sound, Alaska, in March 1989.

UCLA professor charged with embezzling funds

LOS ANGELES — A professor at the University of California, Los Angeles was charged with embezzling at least $735,000 by taking kickbacks from a sister and girlfriend who made arrangements for academic conferences.

Michael H. Chase, a tenured physiology professor, surrendered Wednesday on two charges of grand theft and was released on his own recognizance.

The charges stem from a 1996 investigation by campus auditors into contracts awarded to two companies, one owned by Chase's former girlfriend, Barbara Gibson, the other by his sister, Judy Franzblau.

Authorities claim Chase organized academic conferences on the effects of drugs and alcohol on driving and hired the two women to set them up. Between 1986 and 1996, the university paid Gibson and Franzblau about $1.78 million, using funds from a charitable donation.

But the university said some of the money was improperly funneled back to Chase. The university sued Chase and settled the case in March, when the professor agreed to repay $750,000.

POLICE REPORTS

Reports are taken directly from the K-State and Riley County police departments' daily logs. We do not list wheel locks or minor traffic violations because of space constraints.

Riley County

Wednesday, Nov. 29

■ At 8:48 a.m., Robert E. Cuchy, Ogden, Kan., was arrested for failure to appear. Bond was set at $600.

■ At 5:45 p.m., Rufus L. Terry, Ogden, Kan., was arrested for driving on a suspended license and DUI.

K-State Police

■ No reports of note were made.

The Los Angeles District Attorney's Office at first rejected the university's allegations, citing insufficient evidence to bring a criminal case, prosecutor Richard A. Lowenstein said. But later, during its own investigation, the prosecutor's office traced money from the sister's accounts to those controlled by her brother, Lowenstein said. Prosecutors put the total amount mishandled at least $735,000.

Chase's attorney, Charles C. Wehner, said his client plans to fight the charges.

"It was all legitimate, and Dr. Chase was appropriately paid for work he properly did," Wehner said.

Chase, a UCLA medical school professor since 1969, has job protection because of his tenured position unless he violates a code of conduct. University officials declined to say whether Chase would be disciplined.

Woman overcomes challenges of life with husband deployed to Kuwait

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Dorothy Lowry said she has experienced every role in the Army. She was the child of a Vietnam war veteran, has been on active duty and is in the reserves. Her most urgent concern, though, is her responsibility as an Army spouse.

Lowry's husband, Eric, was deployed to Kuwait on Aug. 1. Eric Lowry's departure left him in charge of U.S. security operations. His wife was left in charge of the household and their two young children.

"I'm an Army brat — not to say it's any easier — it's not tragic or anything," she said. "We understand what their job is."

Eric Lowry most likely will return at the end of December, but Lowry has an optimistic view for the holiday season.

"You have to make a decision — 'Am I going to spend this holiday miserable or make the best of it?'" she said.

Lowry said her ability to cope with her husband's departure probably is due to her own experiences in the military. She was the first woman in her family to be in the Army, and she was enlisted during Operation Desert Storm.

Any type of deployment is dangerous, Lowry said, but worrying about the situation can make people miserable.

"I have faith that my husband is in God's hands," Lowry said. "If you're looking at trouble in the face, you've got to find a way to cope with it."

The Lowrys have lived in Manhattan for three years. Lowry is a labor and delivery nurse, which is an occupation she decided on while in the Army.

Some spouses of those enlisted in the military might find it difficult to balance family life with their professions. Lowry said she wouldn't have it any other way.

"I don't know what it would be like to be married to a mailman," she said. "Unless there is a problem in the relationship before the deployment, you're going to get through it."

"You made a vow for better or for worse, and this could be for worse."

Lowry said she has been blessed with her family's current Dorothy Lowry plays with her son, Jake, 7, and her daughter, Sarah, 20 months, before they go to reunion training in Fort Riley. Lowry's husband, Eric, will come home from Kuwait later this month. Eric Lowry has been in Kuwait since the beginning of August.

living situation. Their neighbor, Dixie Phillips, has been babysitting their children since they moved from Georgia.

Phillips said Lowry works hard to maintain a normal lifestyle for her children. She said wives of men in the Army should be admired.

"In some ways I think she really likes the responsibility," she said. "I don't know if I could do what she's doing."

Although this is Eric Lowry's first long-term deployment, Dorothy Lowry said he often is sent on periodic training missions. She said the departures sometimes are saddening for her children.

"It's not like a sitcom where you're going to identify the problem and resolve it at the end," she said. "Sometimes there's not enough of me to go around."

The Lowrys will be moving back to Georgia soon after Eric Lowry is back from his mission. She said this will be difficult on the family.

"This has been one of my favorite places I've ever been, and I'll be sad to leave," she said. "We're really conscious of the needs for our family."

Jake Lowry, 7, said it's hard to have a dad in the Army because his dad's occupation separates him from friends. While his dad has been gone, he said he has learned to ride a bike.

"It's kind of hard because I don't have anyone to play with except my little sister, but I'm getting used to it," he said.

Lowry and her husband had been best friends for 12 years before their marriage. She said her husband's traveling reminds her of when they dated.

The couple keeps in touch via e-mail. Lowry said technology enables them to be more romantic than they would be face-to-face.

"It's kind of funny, because we had a long-distance relationship before we were married," she said. "It's different when I can say things at a computer."

The temporary separation has been different from those of the past. Lowry said they have become more relaxed, and Eric Lowry is comfortable with his role. She said their teamwork while he has been gone will make them better people.

"I'm real proud of my husband," she said. "My life is better because of who he is and what he does."

Senate hears proposal to revise travel funds

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

The Student Senate Allocations Committee introduced a possible revision Thursday night to current regulations allocating travel funding for campuswide organizations.

Allocations Chair Erica Guries said no formal change or legislation has been written. She said the committee is seeking suggestions on how the guidelines could be revised.

The committee, Guries said, is concerned with activity funds allocated to groups traveling away from campus or Manhattan. She said the events these organizations travel to are legitimate, but the use of student funds should be examined.

"There are a lot of things we can do, and this is just our way of saying we need to do something," she said. "We're not doing this to save money — it's the fact that the majority of students aren't benefiting."

Ben Harder, vice chair of the allocations, said increased expense to fund traveling costs has recently been a concern. He said organizations last spring were permitted to request funding for an event occurring six weeks in advance. This gives groups more freedom, but it has increased demand for traveling funds.

Campuswide organizations used 9.8 percent of the allocations budget for travel two years ago and 28.3 percent one year ago. They now are using about 70 percent of the funding for travel purposes.

Guries said recommendations from senators and students will be used to determine if changes should be made. She said the committee would like to implement an idea by the next fiscal year.

Allocations are funded by student activity fees, Guries said. The money is distributed to the eight college councils after being reviewed and approved by Senate.

Man takes hostage in attempted bank robbery

The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — Police arrested a man Thursday afternoon at a downtown bank after he took at least one person hostage.

Sgt. Mike Patrick said the man, who appeared to be in his 50s, entered the Firststar branch in the heart of the city's downtown commercial district around 12:30 p.m. There were about 20 to 25 bank employees and one patron in the bank at the time.

Patrick said the employees were evacuated from the bank, which occupies the first floor of the six-story building. Employees on the remaining floors were evacuated without incident. There were no reports of injuries.

The man, who was carrying a BB gun, initially demanded money, which was recovered. One hostage was taken but eventually released unharmed, Patrick said. Police talked to the suspect by telephone and arranged his surrender around 1:30 p.m.

Businesses for one block on both sides of the bank were locked down, Patrick said, and patrons evacuated through back doors. The bank remained closed Thursday afternoon as investigators gathered evidence.

A bomb squad from Overland Park was called when it was thought the suspect was carrying explosives. That proved false, Patrick said.

The man was being questioned Thursday afternoon at the Lawrence police department. No charges had been filed, Patrick said. The FBI is assisting with the investigation.

Landon series benefits from student voices

Landon Lectures are a rich part of K-State's history, and students have more power in helping select those who are invited to speak than they might realize. Students can talk to Charles Reagan, associate to the president, who is open to suggestions for speakers.

This would not enable more students to participate but essentially help more students become involved in the process as a whole.

Something that needs to be changed, if possible, for future speakers is to have lectures at more convenient times for students to attend without having to miss class. A lot of speakers give their presentations during the day, whereas the night time might attract a larger audience. Having a speech on at 10:30 on Wednesday might seem like an ideal time, but, in actuality, a lot of students cannot attend because of class.

Granted, speeches usually are arranged at a time period that is convenient for those who are our guest of honor. However, by trying to compromise on a time, it could increase attendance.

Landon Lectures are an essential part of not only our university, but more importantly an important element of our community. Students need to continue to become more involved in the extracurricular activities that are offered. An important step to doing this is by offering suggestions.

Proposed bill needed to limit travel funding

Campus organizations have found an easy way to fund trips: make everyone else pay for it.

Rather than generating their own revenue to travel across the country, many have turned to a place where they know they can wrangle a few dollars — Student Governing Association.

Unfortunately, that money originally was wrangled from the pockets of students.

Once students hand the money over to SGA, the Allocations Committee divides it up. During the past three years, the portion of that money that has gone toward funding travel, lodging and registration fees for campus groups has risen from about 10 percent of the available funds to about 70 percent.

The reason for the rise is simple: campus groups have learned they can get the money.

To receive funding, organizations must submit a request to the Allocations Committee at least six weeks prior to the time they will need the money. Once a request is submitted, the committee is able to provide funding at its discretion — a request does not guarantee funding.

The real problem has emerged only recently. Organizations have rapidly redirected their requests from on-campus activities to activities that require travel. With this shift comes a drastic rise in costs. The problem is not groups asking for their gas mileage to be paid. The problem is groups taking extravagant and lavish trips at the expense of everyone else on campus.

Campus Crusade for Christ, for example, recently submitted a request for more than $12,000 to fund a Christmas Convention voyage to Denver. This amount would have covered the cost of a chartered bus, registration fees and lodging at the Adam's Mark Hotel in Denver. Just less than 100 students were to make the trip.

Campus Crusade is, in my view, an extremely worthy organization (although many people might disagree with my assertion).

They are not, however, worthy of such a significant chunk of the money that can be divided up among all campus organizations.

Luckily, the Allocations Committee has not approved this request. It is in the process of whittling down the figure to something more reasonable and possibly denying the request altogether. But it also has taken an additional step.

To assure no more requests provide lush accommodations for members of groups, the committee has written a bill that would prohibit giving funds to any

K-State group to cover expenses associated with travel.

This bill is right on the money.

Granted, providing money to fund travel definitely has its strong points. Allowing the Marketing Club to represent K-State at a convention or Black Student Union members to travel to Oklahoma for a BSU convention definitely is beneficial to some members of the K-State community.

But the $6,000 price tag associated with the BSU trip makes it absurd.

Every student at K-State contributes to the pool of money the allocations committee divides up.

When students pay their tuition at the beginning of each semester, they pay a privilege fee that goes toward funding campus groups. The idea behind this is that the activities of these groups will be beneficial to the entire K-State community.

Taking trips, however, benefits few. So members of the committee are attempting to correct this mistake. They want to assure that the money students are spending is used to benefit more than a few people hoping to spend a weekend at a distant conference.

They hope this change will force organizations to request money only when they are going to plan events in the Manhattan area.

Rather than traveling to a conference in Denver, they want Campus Crusade to plan their own conference — and to invite others.

The Allocations Committee certainly will face backlash for this move. Many organizations will miss out on worthwhile trips.

But the positive far outweighs the negatives. More groups will seek to attract speakers and conferences to K-State, where more people will benefit. Also, costs will decrease, allowing the money to be spread to a wider number of organizations.

The money that is being spent to pay for trips comes from the pockets of every student on campus.

It is time for that money to benefit a few more of them.

It is time to stop paying for other students' vacations.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Do you know what the Kansas State basketball team needs? A towel guy.

This message is for the person who works out 24/7 and brings millions of dollars of revenue for the university: I am betting you are probably a football player. If that's the case, and from what you said, let's see if you can put your money where your mouth is this Saturday. Go Cats.

Maybe instead of paying someone to demolish Denison, we just have Fort Riley bomb it.

To the athlete who called in yesterday: I was just wondering if my tuition money is also paying for an extra dorm room for you to store your huge ego in.

I wish the boy's basketball players would stop calling in bragging about the millions of dollars in revenue that they are bringing in.

The parking appeals board here sucks. I received two parking citations for parking in a thirty minute zone, but there was no sign indicating that it was a thirty minute zone. I had to appeal to the president's office, who not only refunded my money, but installed signs there.

If a person isn't smart enough to fill out a circle on a test correctly, they don't deserve to pass the test or the class.

Let's say the driver of the Ryder truck is a Democrat. Now at the state house a few votes show up short, Republican votes that is.

Student activism will lead Lafene to make changes

When you hear the word "Lafene," what image springs to mind?

Is it someone going in for treatment and finding out they have 20 minutes to live? Or someone who goes in for an ear infection and walks out with acne medicine?

First and foremost, there are some doctors at Lafene Health Center who deserve their title. They deserve to walk with their shoulders back and pride in their step because they care about their jobs. More importantly, they care about who their jobs can help, namely students.

However, the doctor I saw last Monday did not deserve his title. Perhaps he obtained it from a Cracker Jack box.

I'm just thankful he isn't my "woman's doctor," because he probably would've been looking for my ovaries in someplace like my ears.

One week before Thanksgiving, I was thankful to catch the nasty flu/cold bug that ran rampant through our campus faster than the flood in Denison Hall.

Granted, there is very little that can be done when you catch the flu. You need fluids, rest and time. You also need to associate yourself with people who think regurgitating is attractive.

To top it off, I had a severe sinus infection. That resulted in one hour of sleep per night for over a week, coughing up various body parts and talking like some sort of cross between a cheap sex phone line operator and someone who speaks through their nose.

However, the doctor at Lafene did not give me any medicine for my sinus infection, even after I told him that no over-the-counter medicine worked.

But rest assured, he did draw a map. Maybe he thought I played for the football team.

I didn't need a map to tell me I felt "99-percent tired and plugged." I didn't need a map to tell me to take warm showers. I didn't need a map to tell me to rest. I needed some damn medicine.

Seven minutes later, I left Lafene (had it been this week, I would have went with the Fourum's suggestion of going to the Vet Med Center instead).

Over the holiday break, I went to a real doctor and obtained some real medicine. Don't you just love how sometimes the word "real" isn't associated with certain places? As if Lafene isn't "real," but instead a world where rainbows and fluffy clouds formed by a placebo of penicillin enhanced with unicorns exist.

Students should not receive poor treatment at their health center. We have paid our dues. We deserve to be checked thoroughly and listened to.

We don't deserve maps when we need medicine, and we don't need antibiotics when we really just need rest.

The bottom line is, if you have a horror story or a positive one to tell about Lafene, there are things you need to do. Write to Lafene or call its administration line at 532-7755.

Write a letter to the editor and drop it by Kedzie 116; just make sure you have your student ID. Or send an e-mail to letters@pub.ksu.edu. Speak out, and speak often. Tell them if they are doing a great job or if they have let you down.

If the only thing that continues to be done is calling the Fourum there will be little or no change. Anonymity represents a lack of passion, thus stems forth a seeming lack of indifference.

If you want things to remain the same, continue with the comical side. Just realize that students are the butt of those jokes.

1st recount mandatory solely due to Florida law; analogy with multiple-choice tests flawed

Editor,

Donald Crawford, let me ask you this.

Have you forgotten the real reason the ballots were recounted the first time?

Not because any machinery was working improperly, nor because of any whining or complaining on anybody's part. It was because of the percentage of difference. According to Florida law, if the percentage of difference is not greater than .5 percent, a machine recount is mandatory.

So a machine recount was done, and George W. Bush won — again. And that's when the whining and accusations began by the Gore camp.

So, for no other reason than to appease Gore, a second recount was done. And Bush won — again. And on and on ... we all know the rest of the story.

No matter how the votes, real or implied, have been counted, Bush has won Florida every single time — even without many legitimate votes from our overseas military (which it appears would have added to Bush's count, not Gore's) included. It's a moot point; Gore truly is kicking a dead horse.

Now I agree, IF a student's test was misgraded by a machine, not only once but twice, or even four times, and it was because of machine failure or incomplete instructions given by the instructor, a hand-grading would be appropriate.

I would even go so far as to say that all tests should be hand-graded, because if the machine or the professor truly failed, all the students in that class deserve the chance to know their tests were graded correctly.

However, if the fault was because the student didn't pay attention to the professor's instructions and mark the circles correctly (including darkly enough, as we've all been taught to do since — for most of us — grade school, or the student wasn't sure he or she was doing the right thing, but didn't ask for clearer instructions, assuming the grading machine would be able to read the intent the professor has every right to call an end to the grading as is most fair to every student involved in the class.

The election is over, and Bush has won. We all should be calling on Gore and his supporters to bow out gracefully, before any more damage is done to our nation and the office of president of the United States.

Former astronaut discusses experiences

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

Albert Sacco Jr., former astronaut and chemical engineer, presented "Living and Working in Space — A Scientist's/Teacher's Perspective" on Thursday evening as part of the Eyestone Distinguished Lecture Series, sponsored by K-State College of Engineering.

Sacco, who flew as a payload specialist aboard the space shuttle Columbia in 1995, geared his lecture towards his space experience rather than relying heavily on the science aspect.

"I went to space to do science, but it was much more than that," he said. "People do not go into space for the ride. There is a one in 90 chance for a loss of life. That is a serious risk that we have to accept."

Sacco flew with a crew of seven, three pilots and four scientists.

"We all had our specialized area, but we really had to come together as a team," he said. "We had lots of schooling to learn how to repair something that went wrong. There was enough wire in the shuttle to go around the Earth once, so there was almost a guarantee something was going to happen. We just had to be prepared for it."

Sacco said the group trained for two years for 13-15 hours a day to help prepare for the mission.

"We had hands-on classes, lots of schooling and intense physical workouts to get our body fat down," he said. "Of course, once the day was over, we would go grab a pizza and a beer. They never understood why we didn't lose weight."

Sacco's mission has the NASA record for the most delays to launch a space program with six aborted attempts.

"We were isolated seven days before the flight was scheduled to decrease the chance of coming in contact with germs," he said. "But, since our flight was delayed so many times, we were together in isolation for 42-43 days and then aboard a space shuttle the size of a bus for 16 days. We really had to learn to get along."

Sacco said the group also has two more NASA records: the most chocolate chip cookies eaten by a crew and the most margaritas drank by a crew.

"After each launch was delayed they would take us back in isolation and give us chocolate chip cookies and margaritas," he said. "We ate 3,700 cookies and tons of frozen margaritas. We are pretty proud of owning that record."

Sacco said everyone always asked him if he was scared, but that his answer surprised some.

"I was not scared at the time of launch, but two to three months before I woke up in the middle of the night sweating and asking myself,

JEANEL DRAKE/Collegian

Albert Sacco Jr. was a speaker in the Eyestone Distinguished Lecture Series put on by the College of Engineering on Thursday afternoon in Fiedler Hall. Sacco spoke to more than 200 students, faculty and community members about his time as a payload specialist on STS-73, which was a 16-day mission in space.

"Why am I doing this?" he said. "It is a serious risk, but once you accept the risk it is all in the back of your head, and you are ready for it. You know you have trained well and you accept that problems may go wrong, but there is no reason to worry because you are prepared."

Sacco believes the mission was important because of the science they did while in orbit.

"We were able to grow proteins in a different environment," he said.

"They grew slower so it was easier to study and it allowed us to identify them more closely. We were able to get three dimensional pictures that were helpful for the HIV virus and forms of cancer."

Sacco said he also learned an important lesson while in space.

"I learned that it is important to use your own intellect and look beyond what the book says," he said. "As scientists, we were trained to see certain things and we would bring the pilots down and they would see something we missed. I knew there was a lesson there."

Even though Sacco did not focus on the science aspect, many of the students who attended the lecture said they gained something from it.

"I expected the science part, but what he did was much better," Ryan Philbrick, freshman in general engineering, said. "I learned a lot more because I was interested in the space program and what all was involved in a launch."

Tim Newlin, freshman in electrical engineering, said he agreed.

"I went to the Kennedy Space Center this summer, and this lecture really helped give me some first hand experience to what I saw," he said. "It made my experience even better."

Sacco said he realizes he was lucky to be chosen for such a mission, and would do it again if he could.

"I was the 327th human being to go to space," he said, "and I am very proud of that fact. I would do it again in a minute. It is a wonderful, humbling experience."

Organizers of Landon Lecture encourage student suggestions

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

Charles Reagan, associate to the president, said he is open to suggestions on future Landon lectures.

"We don't have a set selection committee," Reagan said. "We take and welcome suggestions from the public, faculty, students and Landon Lecture patrons and then we narrow the field down from there."

Reagan, along with K-State President Jon Wefald and former Sen.

Nancy Kassebaum Baker, make the final selection of lecturers.

"We look for people from different fields," Reagan said. "We try and vary them so that we don't have, for example, three journalists in a row."

Reagan said they mainly look for people who deal with public affairs.

"We are not into the business of having celebrity or self-help lectures," he said.

"Instead we schedule journalists, Cabinet members, intellectuals, writers or historians."

There also is not a set number of lecturers for the year.

"It really varies," Reagan said. "We have very high standards for our speakers, and we don't want to lower those to have a fixed number of speakers. We can have as many as five or as few as none. It depends on who is available and who we invite."

The Landon Lectures are completely funded through support from the Landon Patrons, Reagan said.

"They donate $150 per person," he said. "They also help suggest lecturers in either a letter form or they call us up and tell us if they have someone in mind. Most of them have great contacts, too, which helps us schedule certain speakers."

Edward Seaton, chairman of the Landon Patrons, said he usually has several ideas of people who would make good lecturers.

"It's not a matter of coming up with public figures that are a top of public affairs," he said. "It's the persuading them to come that's the hard part."

Seaton said they work through that by having people who have some sort of influence contact the potential speaker.

"A lot of us have certain connections," he said. "For example, I usually deal with foreign speakers and then former senator Nancy Kassebaum has definite connections in the government."

Reagan said he encourages students to attend the lectures.

"We usually have a great number of community members, but few students," he said. "Which is hard to understand because the people that are speaking are the most powerful and influential people in the community and few students show up. It would be a great experience for them."

The next Landon Lecture is scheduled for April 19, with Stephen Ambrose speaking as part of the Eisenhower Symposium. Other invitations have been extended and accepted, but no dates have been set.

Scars left from last Big 12 loss

By DEREK BOSS
 Kansas State Collegian

Senior defensive end Monty Beisel would rather not relive the tragedy of K-State's last trip to a Big 12 Championship game.

"That was a tough feeling. I know it's on a lot of minds here on campus now, and I know the seniors have that in the back of their heads as well," Beisel said. "It's something we definitely don't want to happen again."

BISHOP

Dec. 5, 1998, the No. 2/1 Wildcats took their undefeated 11-0 record to St. Louis, Mo., to face 10th-ranked Texas A&M in the conference title game — a win and K-State would secure a bid to play for its first national championship.

Those hopes were dashed, however, as the Aggies pulled the upset, 36-33, in double overtime at the RCA Dome.

The stunning loss took a few weeks to surmount, Beisel said. "You saw Coach (Bill) Snyder walking around with his tie undone and people just had their heads hanging — it was a whole different atmosphere."

Snyder won't deny the extreme disappointment that surfaced after the A&M defeat, either, especially considering what was at stake.

"It was difficult to deal with at the time, not only for me, but it was difficult for a lot of people," Snyder said. "If you make that tremendous investment in your preparation — and it's an emotional investment as well — and if you fail to succeed, then obviously there's some pain that goes along with it, and there was at that time."

"And maybe that game, more so than others, perhaps because of what was on the line."

However, 1998 simply was that — '98.

"Yeah, that's behind us. It was behind us the next day," Snyder said. "Was there still some pain involved? Well, sure there was. That happens in a lot of venues. You do things in your life that certainly bring about some pain, and it diminishes over time, obviously, but that's not the issue."

"The issue is, what do you do during that time while the pain is diminishing? Are you productive or are you sitting around and feeling sorry for yourself? And we certainly didn't do that."

Nevertheless, in the 2000 Big 12 Championship, the roles have been reversed. K-State no longer is the heavy favorite as they were against the Aggies. Oklahoma is now in the position the Cats were two years ago — vying for a national title.

That shift in roles suits senior wide-out Quincy Morgan just fine, as long as the game's outcome changes with it.

"I hope there's a reversal, because the underdog won last time," Morgan said. "So if that's how it's going to be, then let it be."

However, Snyder said neither the underdog or favorite nor the point spread of the game should affect anything whatsoever.

"Whether that's right or wrong, I can't tell you, but I'm still hard-pressed to understand how somebody can put a point value on a ball game that hasn't been played when there's so many variables," Snyder said.

"Every time you snap the ball, there's 22 variables, plus officials, on the field. Who knows? I don't know how anybody can understand that."

Regardless of the line on the game, Snyder said he would never alter K-State's preparation. Even if he could go back two seasons ago against A&M, his approach would be no different.

"You go back to the '98 ball game, and in reference to that, would it change the preparation?" he said. "Our preparation, I

Cats to fight for Big 12 title

Snyder prepares for rematch against No. 1 Sooners

By DEREK BOSS
 Kansas State Collegian

Bill Snyder and conference title games don't have peachy relations.

But the Cat head coach doesn't have much choice in the matter Saturday, as his No. 8/7 Wildcats are set to meet top-ranked Oklahoma in the 2000 Big 12 Championship.

"I've not changed my opinion. I still feel the same way," he said. "I'm glad we have a chance to play the game, but I don't think that's in the best interest of the Big 12 Conference to have what we have."

Regardless, the stage is set this weekend for a rematch with the Sooners, although Snyder said coaching against the same team twice in a season is a new experience for him.

"I don't recall any at this particular point in time," he said. "I haven't thought about it, but I don't think so. Championship games are kind of new."

Nevertheless, purple faithful haven't forgotten the earlier meeting with OU in Manhattan this season. Amid the hype of ESPN's "College Gameday" telecast from the Little Apple, coupled with the publicity of a national ABC audience, the Sooners handed K-State its first loss in 2000, snapping the Cats' six-game win streak to start the season.

Despite OU's win over the Cats, though, Snyder doesn't buy into the notion that it's hard to beat the same team twice in season.

"I've never looked at any statistics in reference to that, so I don't know," he said. "It happens in basketball because everybody plays everybody twice. I don't know what the statistics are there, and I wouldn't know how to equate that to football, anyway."

In fact, neither team has a particular advantage in the rematch, Snyder said, as both squads are presented with the same opportunities.

"In my way of thinking, it's probably even," he said. "You both have an opportunity to go back and view the things that you did well and the things that you didn't do well, what your opponent did and didn't do against you, and utilize that information in your preparation."

"I've said before, if you gave me my druthers, I'd rather be the team that won the first ball game, not for an advantage for this game, I'd just like to have had that ball game."

Linebacker Ben Leber wanted that game as well, but said it's important not to let that revenge factor cloud the team's execution.

"If we come out there and play with too much emotion and get too fired up, then we lose focus on what we're trying to do," Leber said. "So there's obviously that little bit of desire in your gut that you want to go out there and get revenge, but you've got to take it as a game — do the right things to win and not get caught up in the emotion."

However, that doesn't go to say the Cat players won't be anxious for a shot at a Big 12 Championship, Snyder said. The Cats will be motivated.

"These are 19-, 20-, 21-year-old young people, and they are, but if you've been around the face of this earth for 19, 20, 21 years, you understand some things," he said.

"They know the significance of this ball game, and for me to get up in the middle of them and jump up and down is not going to affect how emotionally enthused they get for this ball game. They'll be excited about it."

Much of that excitement stems from what K-State has to lose this weekend, Leber said, as a Cat victory secures them an automatic BCS bid in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl.

"There's a lot at stake," he said. "We know that if we win this game we can go to a pretty good bowl game, so that's the driving motivation right now."

Yet Snyder isn't contemplating K-State's bowl situation should Oklahoma win Saturday.

"Let me hope that we don't lose the ball game, and if we do, I'll deal with whatever comes at that time," Snyder said. "I certainly don't want to spend any time thinking about how disappointed I'd be about anything."

Quarterback Jonathan Beasley isn't thinking about that, either, nor is he focusing on the Cats' opportunity to ruin OU's national championship hopes.

"If we mess up the BCS, we do," Beasley said. "We're not really worried about that. We just want to win the Big 12 Championship."

"For the seniors, it's going to be the last opportunity ever to do that. We're fortunate enough just to be in this situation, so we're going to take advantage of it and play the best we can."

Sell-out crowd to fill Arrowhead

Tickets for the 2000 Big 12 Championship game are sold-out, K-State Sports Information confirmed Tuesday. However, whether the Wildcats will have any kind of home field advantage playing in Kansas City, Mo., remains to be seen, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"It kind of depends on how deep the pockets are, I guess," he said, referring to the $55 ticket prices. "Just the idea that we only had 8,000 tells me that we could be in trouble in that respect."

"We might not have the vast majority in the stadium — I don't know. I don't know who bought all the tickets originally. I mean, I don't get into that."

When asked how much he would pay to attend a conference title game, though, Snyder said with a grin, "I'd watch it on television."

QUICK FACTS

■ Saturday will mark the second time in the past three seasons K-State has played in the Big 12 Championship game.

■ Head coach Bill Snyder and the North Division champion Wildcats had last Saturday off, while South Division winner Oklahoma improved its record to a perfect 11-0 with a narrow 12-7 victory over intrastate rival Oklahoma State.

■ K-State will be looking for its first conference title since 1934, when head coach Lynn "Pappy" Waldorf's squad prevailed as the Big Six Champions, posting a 7-2-1 overall record, including a perfect 5-0 mark in league play.

■ The 2000 conference title game features a rematch between the Wildcats and Sooners, with Oklahoma having won the earlier meeting this season, a 41-31 triumph Oct. 14 in Manhattan.

■ Saturday will be the 11th time in school history K-State has faced a team twice in the same season, but the first time since 1944. That year, the Cats tied Wichita State, 6-6, at home Sept. 30 and defeated the Shockers, 15-0, in Wichita on Nov. 4.

■ K-State's trip to Arrowhead Stadium this weekend will be the team's second of the season. The Cats also played in Kansas City, Mo., in their Aug. 26 season-opener, a 27-7 victory over Iowa in the Eddie Robinson Classic.

■ With 10 wins this season, the Wildcats now have had six seasons in 105 years with double figure victories, five coming in the Snyder era. Only K-State and Florida State have had double-digit wins in each of the past three seasons. The Cats also are the only school besides Florida, Nebraska and the Seminoles with at least nine victories every year since 1993.

■ Senior David Allen will have one final opportunity to break two of NCAA Division I-A's oldest records on Saturday, as performances in bowl games don't count on the career charts. The Liberty, Mo., native is currently in a three-way tie for most punt returns for touchdowns in a career with seven, and also is just 57 yards shy of eclipsing the career punt return yardage record of 1,695, maintained by Lee Nalley (1947-49) of Vanderbilt.

Wildcat injury update

Junior free safety Jon McGraw, who sat out the Missouri game two weeks ago after suffering an apparent shoulder injury Nov. 11 against Nebraska, will be back in the Wildcat lineup Saturday, head coach Bill Snyder said. McGraw ranks second on the K-State defensive unit with 76 tackles, 17 shy of team leader Monty Beisel.

■ In addition, left tackle Milford Stephenson exited the Missouri contest in the second quarter with an unspecified injury and did not return. However, Snyder said the senior is practicing and will make his return for the Big 12 Championship game this weekend.

Stopping Heupel key to ensuring victory for K-State

By DAN SMITH
 Kansas State Collegian

K-State must stop Heisman trophy candidate Josh Heupel.

The defensive philosophy is that simple, yet K-State's game plan remains hidden behind a veil of secrecy that head coach Bill Snyder and his defensive brain-trust refuse to divulge.

"I don't think that it would be appropriate for me to respond in regards to what our game plan is going to be," Snyder said Tuesday. "We've seen everything that everybody has done against Oklahoma, but I'm not going to tell you what we're going to do."

Wildcat defensive lineman Mario Fatafehli echoed his coach's sentiments.

"It's top secret," the senior said. "We know what they're going to do, and we know what we did wrong last time."

Mario Fatafehli brings down Oklahoma quarterback Josh Heupel in the first half of K-State's 41-31 loss to Oklahoma at KSU Stadium earlier this season.

Oklahoma's QB to have his best day of the year. Heupel erupted for 374 yards through the air, the most given up by K-State's second-ranked defense this season.

Linebacker Ben Leber said the lackluster performance was due to poor execution.

"We went into that game knowing that we had to stop Heupel and stop his receivers, but we didn't get it done," he said. "Obviously, that's going to stay the same — that's not going to change."

To stop the Sooner signal-caller, K-State also will have to deal with Oklahoma's talented receiving corps of Antwone Savage, Curtis Fagan, Andre Woolfolk, and Josh Norman, as well as the receiving and rushing abilities of fullback Quentin Griffin.

Defense faces challenge

By MICHAEL NOLL
 Kansas State Collegian

By now, nearly every college football fan has developed a theory on how to defend the Oklahoma offense, the most popular being to use the now infamous "umbrella defense" employed so successfully by Oklahoma State last Saturday.

The Cowboys rushed just three, and sometimes two, linemen and dropped everybody else back into pass coverage. The result — a team that was dead last in the Big 12 Conference in pass defense held Heisman hopeful Josh Heupel to just 154 yards passing.

It would seem that with the umbrella's success, K-State fans should expect plenty of rain tomorrow in Kansas City, Mo.

Or maybe not.

"Probably more fire," defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said, referring to his team's propensity for blitzing. "I'm a stubborn guy. I've been doing this for a lot of years — I have a system and I believe in that system. I think that you do what you're capable of doing."

"I don't think you become an umbrella defense in a week."

So, fans probably should expect to see essentially the same package employed in the Cats' previous game against Oklahoma. K-

Big 12 game to determine bowl bid

DEFENSE

"Bowl bids."

They may be the two most confusing and frustrating words to hit the college football world as the season winds down.

There's no escaping it, and it's conceivably impossible not to get caught up in the bowl hype once November and December roll around. It's almost worse than the Heisman balloting ... OK, OK, maybe that's a little harsh.

Regardless, bowl bids are the bath houses of the storied college football programs around the nation. Just look at Notre Dame.

The Fighting Irish are a prime example of a team that's history and publicity carry it year-in and year-out. Nine of its 11 games were televised on either NBC, ABC or CBS national television this season.

Now, you can't tell me that bowl representatives don't look at track records and media attention when selecting between programs. This year, of the 11 teams in the top 25 with two losses on their record, No. 11/10 Notre Dame looks to be the only one that'll get any consideration for an at-large BCS bowl berth. Interesting, huh?

K-State (10-2) can still get an automatic BCS bid if it wins its conference championship game this weekend, as will the winner of the Florida (9-2)/Auburn (9-2) contest in the SEC.

Nevertheless, at-large bids are reserved for schools notorious for their football heritage. Look at K-State in 1998.

The Wildcats were undefeated at 11-0 and ranked No. 1 and 2 in the nation heading into the Big 12 Championship game against No. 10 Texas A&M. After falling to the Aggies, it was understandable for K-State to lose its berth in the national championship game, but a BCS bowl was at least a sure thing, right?

Wrong.

The Cats got hosed, failing to receive an at-large BCS bid, which were instead dealt to No. 7 Florida (9-2) and No. 3 Ohio State (10-1), all because those two programs have more reputable "revenue potential." K-State would end up dropping all the way down to the Builder's Square Alamo Bowl.

That's when this season comes into play, because in 2000, it's a reversal of roles. This time in the Big 12 title game, the Wildcats are not the same undefeated team that will be playing with a national championship on the line. In fact, it's Oklahoma that sits in that position.

However, if K-State knocks off the top-ranked Sooners this weekend, rest assured that OU will still ironically find itself an at-large BCS bowl bid. With its history and national prominence as a football program, they won't run into the same problems that the Wildcats endured two seasons ago.

It's simply ridiculous. At any rate, though, it's important to understand how much K-State has at stake this Saturday in Kansas City, Mo.

With the shakiness and uncertainty of the bowl system, the Cats need to capitalize when they have destiny in their own hands. Carpe diem, I tell you.

A K-State win over Oklahoma gives the Cats an automatic BCS bid in the Tostitos Fiesta Bowl, no matter who likes it (I like this scenario, as it's foolproof that we won't get screwed over this year).

But a K-State loss makes things much more complicated (and vulnerable to tragedy). The Southwest Bell Cotton Bowl continues to emerge as a strong possibility, although the snubbing they gave the Wildcats in '98 still remains bitter to purple faithful.

Nebraska is the other contender for a Cotton Bowl bid, and the Huskers haven't played in Dallas since 1980. However, K-State athletics director Max Urick said feedback he's received from the Cotton Bowl has been positive, indicating the Cats would receive an invitation should they lose to OU (unless it's an ugly one).

As for the Culligan Holiday Bowl, Texas already has accepted the invitation. Enough said.

If, for some reason, the Cats can't lock a trip to either the Fiesta or Cotton Bowls, that leaves the Sylvania Alamo Bowl and the Insight.com Bowl, which would serve as disappointing ends to a highly anticipated K-State football season.

So let's hope the Cats have destiny on their side at Arrowhead on Saturday. Besides, a trip to Tempe, Ariz., this winter would suit me just fine.

DEREK BOSS

RYAN CHITTUM

during pregame didn't intimidate the ascendant Sooners.

What was up with that? Maybe if you'd let the smelly, mid-life-crisis-having mullethead Hog gods stay in the stadium, you could have topped 50,000. We heard that weird display is a tradition. I guess you have got to invent stuff when you lack a real tradition like we have here at the University of Oklahoma: winning.

It's too bad we have to play in Arrowhead Stadium this time. I'm pretty sure the Chiefs' organization is going to keep out the Harleys. While I'm on the topic of facilities, how about figuring out a decent name for your stadium? Come on, KSU Stadium? How inspiring.

The game will be played in chilly Kansas City, Mo., at night. With the poor showing your receivers put on against OU in October, there is real cause for you to have concern when they have cold hands. I haven't ever seen a worse stone-hands performance by a respected receiver corps like yours in all my years of college football fandom. It seemed like Muffy Morgan and Aaron Drop-it coughed up more balls than they caught.

But most of the time the ball didn't even get there. Jonnie Beasley was a miserable 14-of-36 through the air. We're sorry. Rabid K-State fans and even some in the national media were mentioning your quarterback as a Heisman Trophy candidate. Two crushing losses and several poor performances later, nobody knows his name. That's too bad.

Oklahoma's quarterback, meanwhile, crossed paths with the faltering Beasley, not only overtaking him, but making him look silly. The Heisman Trophy race has come down to two players, and Josh Heupel is one of them.

Chris Weinke is the other, but OU's 12-0 record after our Saturday shellacking of your team, along with Heupel's 400 yards, will give OU its fourth Heisman Trophy winner.

The No. 1 Sooners have been holding back the last two weeks, not wanting to show our cards to your worked-to-death coaching staff. Don't worry, Snyder.

We'll hold up signs in the stands so you can remember your family's names.

We're thoughtful like that. But believe this: K-State won't know what hit them when they retreat to the locker room at halftime down two touchdowns.

If you see a Wildcat player before the game, tell them they should start playing before the fourth quarter this time. We don't want things to get too out of hand. After all, there will be a national television audience watching and it would look bad for our beloved Big 12 Conference.

Put up a fight. OU is good this year, but we're only going to get better. This might be your last chance to beat us for a long time.

If you want to really be helpful, you can bring a sack full of oranges to help us celebrate OU's big win. We'll even let you root for us in the national championship game.

kind of stay within your packages."

Of course, if K-State had run its packages correctly the first time against Oklahoma, the result might have been very different. Missed tackles and poor defensive match-ups contributed greatly to the loss Oct. 14, linebacker Ben Leber said.

"Schematically, it was there. We were set with the schemes, but it's obviously the execution. We've just got to focus each play and execute. That was our problem," he said.

Matchups also posed problems for the Cat secondary, as K-State often found itself with its shortest cornerback defending Oklahoma's biggest receiver, Bennett said.

"One of the things I looked at, on crucial downs, I didn't do a good job of creating good matchups, and we didn't tackle well," he said. "I think if we can take the mental errors out of our game and just overall play better, I think we'll have a much better chance than we had in October."

And as to the question of whether K-State's defensive backs can defend Oklahoma's receivers one-on-one, the answer is pretty simple, strong safety Jon McGraw said.

"Yeah, I believe that we can cover their receivers," he said.

But don't count out a little umbrella defense here and there. K-State can run zone coverage, too.

"We have ample amount," McGraw said. "We haven't used it much this season, but it's there."

part in K-State's ineffectiveness.

"We had some of us not knowing exactly where guys were supposed to be, not knowing who was supposed to cover who in certain situations, so that was confusing," he said.

"There was a lack of communication on defense."

Communication, coverage and execution will be important if K-State is to stop Heupel and come away from Saturday's rematch victorious, Leber said.

"I don't think there's going to be anything different," he said. "The bottom line is we have to stop the passing game, that's what hurt us last time. Everything was there for us, we just didn't execute and we have to tackle."

Oklahoma. K-State blitzed linebackers, safeties and the occasional cornerback, in addition to the four down linemen already trying to reach Heupel. In turn, the remaining defensive backs were placed in one-on-one coverage.

The results of that game plan were mixed. The Cats did amass four sacks, but the Sooners QB was still able to pass for 374 yards and two touchdowns. Following the game, Oklahoma offensive coordinator Mark Mangino belittled the Cats' defensive game plan.

"They blitzed us on every down. You can't do that to us. Josh and our receivers and our tight ends and running backs, they'll hurt you if you do that to us," Mangino said. "You have to mix it up a little bit against us, and they just brought pressure constantly. Eventually, we'll find a way to get the ball downfield."

That leads back to the OU-OSU game. It would seem that Oklahoma cannot get the ball downfield against the umbrella — but there also are extenuating circumstances, Bennett said.

"I think what's not been said is there's been a lot of people who have rushed three and dropped eight against OU the last two years, a lot of people. And the thing that didn't come out is OSU played very, very hard," he said. "They were punishing receivers, they had a fanatical effort, and I don't know how much of it was schemes."

"There were open receivers. I watched that tape over and over, and it was just one of those days that Josh just didn't play as well as I'm sure he's capable of playing."

So K-State probably will stick with its own defensive philosophy, with possibly a hint of OU opponents' schemes thrown in, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"I think there is always something that you can take from viewing your opponent play someone else. Regardless of who it is and who they play against, there's always something you can take," he said. "Now, does that mean you're going to take their schemes and duplicate those? Not necessarily, and more often than not, probably not, because you have to

In the teams' Oct. 14 meeting, Heupel lit up the K-State defense with two touchdowns and completions to six different receivers. His second TD pass was also his longest completion of the year, but Savage did most of the work.

The sophomore caught the short pass on the right sideline, broke five tackles, and raced 74 yards and six points.

Free safety Jon McGraw said Oklahoma was successful in confusing the K-State defense with various formations, but communication and execution played a larger thought, was pretty good. To go into the fourth quarter with a 16-point lead tells me we did something pretty well in our preparation."

Tabbed as the underdog in this year's conference title, though, Snyder said he views it as a second opportunity, one K-State must take full advantage of.

"We're talking about a second chance in our ball game against Oklahoma, a team that defeated us, and another second opportunity to get a chance at a league title — a Big 12 Championship," he said. "That's part of it. In regards to whether we're underdogs or not, I don't know how that would play into anybody's mind. It doesn't in mine."

At any rate, however, '98 and 2000 do have one thing in common, Leber said.

"The same thing's at stake — we both want to win," he said. "That's the bottom line."

Professional performance of Dickens' 'A Christmas Carol' to play at McCain

By CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

One of the world's most beloved holiday tales will make an appearance on the McCain Auditorium stage this weekend.

At 3 p.m. Sunday, the Nebraska Theatre Caravan will present Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol." Thom Jackson, McCain marketing and development officer, said he expects a crowd of between 1,200 and 1,400 Sunday afternoon.

Dickens' tale is about an old miser who realizes the true meaning of the holiday season after encountering three Christmas spirits. The novel was published in 1843.

The popularity of this show is due to its appeal to people of all ages, Jackson said.

"Children will enjoy the spectacle of it all. The lighting, sets and costumes are spectacular," he said. "Teens will enjoy the story-line, and older people will look at the story in the venue of reflection. Only this experience can give you that added dimension."

"The story is very cross-generational," Jackson said. "The story has something that everyone just loves, be it the costumes or music or characters. It's very easy to relate to the characters."

Richard Martin, McCain director, said viewing this particular stage production is a treat audiences won't want to miss.

"They incorporate authentic carols into their production. It has the carols that everyone knows," he said. "I've never been disappointed with what these actors have done. They're believable."

Jackson said seeing the stage version will touch audiences just as much as watching an adaptation on TV.

"It's even better to see it live, because there are so many bad televised versions," he said. Martin said this tale, and the moral of the story, will both entertain and educate audiences.

"Most people don't come to the theater to be educated. They come to the theater for enjoyment. If you can entertain and educate, you've accomplished something special," Martin said.

Before the 3 p.m. production, there will be a high tea at the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art from 1 to 2:30 p.m.

Jackson said both events will be a fun way to kick off the holiday season.

"There will be plenty to eat, drink and be merry about," he said.

EVENT INFO

Tickets for "A Christmas Carol" are $24 for adults, $22 for seniors and $12 for students and children. Tickets for the 1 p.m. high tea at the Beach art museum are $15. Tickets for both events can be ordered at the McCain Box Office or by calling 532-6428.

Folk singer to perform family concert, semester's final BirdHouse performance

By KRISTEN DYMACEK
Kansas State Collegian

He has been known throughout the world for 25 years as an influential folk singer.

He has played with folk talents such as Pete Seeger and Tom Chapin.

He has performed at the Kennedy Center and the Lincoln Center.

This weekend, he will be performing at the Manhattan Arts Center.

Folk singer/songwriter John McCutcheon is the final BirdHouse performer of the semester and will be presenting a children's show and an evening family concert Saturday.

Birdhouse co-founder David Kamerer said McCutcheon, who plays several instruments including the hammer dulcimer, fiddle, guitar and banjo, is widely recognized for his folk music.

"He's everything that's good about traditional folk music," Kamerer said. "He is a wonderful singer/songwriter."

He said McCutcheon, who has released more than 20 folk albums, is especially popular in this area because he has headlined the Walnut Valley Festival in Winfield, Kan., for several years.

McCutcheon's songs are similar to well-known folk singer Seeger, Kamerer said.

"He's political. He writes songs from the headlines," he said. "He sings songs of peace and justice. He's a strong labor supporter. He's found the way to take experiences we face and write songs about them." He said McCutcheon's songs are ones that will stay around for a long time.

"His songs get handed down from generation to generation," Kamerer said.

COURTESY PHOTO

Even though tickets for the 8 p.m. performance are sold out, tickets for the 2 p.m. children's show are still available.

Kamerer said McCutcheon is an expert children's performer.

"He really gets what it's like to be a kid," he said. "Only a small handful of artists can do it, and John McCutcheon is one of the best."

McCutcheon has released a number of children's albums, including his first, "Howjadoo," in 1983.

"His children's songs are very much in the tradition of the songs Woody Guthrie wrote for his kids," Kamerer said.

Both concerts should be good experiences for the audiences, Gretchen Holden, BirdHouse board member, said.

"It's incredible that we're able to bring somebody of this stature to Manhattan," Holden said. "I've heard about this man all my life, but I've never had the opportunity to see him play. Not many people have had the chance to see him before."

Kamerer said McCutcheon's performances will not soon be forgotten.

"When you leave, you'll feel inspired and full of life," he said.

"It's an amazing, inspirational experience to see John McCutcheon in concert."

Rec Report

Recreational Services' Office Located in Peters Recreation Complex

Intramurals

One of the biggest draws to the Rec Complex, besides it being an amazing facility, is the wide variety of intramural sports offered. Recreational Services offers everything from Sports Trivia to Miniature Golf to Wrestling to Flag Football. In all, there are 50 different opportunities to participate in intramurals each year.

Every year, thousands of people take advantage of the chance to compete for the title of "University Champion" in a given sport. Intramurals are offered in singles, doubles, triples and team events. There are men's and women's divisions offered in each sport. Most sports also offer a co-rec division. Men are subdivided into independent, fraternity and residence hall divisions. Women all compete in one division.

Intramurals are attractive to students for a variety of reasons, according to Steve Martini, Director of Intramurals, but competition is the main reason.

"People like to play sports in a competitive setting and lots of K-State students have that kind of background from high school," said Martini. Competition is also what keeps a lot of the same teams coming back to play each year. You will find many of the same teams listed year after year.

It is difficult to count the exact number of students taking part in intramurals each year. However, by looking at individual sports, you can get a feel for just how many people are involved in intramurals. One of the most popular sports offered is Basketball. "Last year 2100 men and 600 women took part in basketball alone," said Martini. "This is roughly 15% of the student population that played basketball last year."

"Basketball is probably the most popular sport. Most people are exposed during high school and it is a sport you can play year round," said John Wondra, Assistant Director of Intramurals.

Another opportunity that comes with intramurals is the chance to officiate. "Rec Services employs around 250 officials for seven different sports during the course of a year," said Wondra. Officials are paid $6.50 per hour. It is a great opportunity to earn extra money in a job that works around your schedule. The Rec trains all of the officials, so there is no need for outside training.

Any currently enrolled student is eligible for intramural competition. Faculty and staff are also eligible to play in either the student division or in the faculty/staff division that is offered in specific activities.

Whether you want to play for fun or competition, intramurals offers both. If you don't have a team to play on, but would still like to play, take the time to look at the "Player/Team Wanted" board located in the Intramural Gallery at the Rec. For more information, contact call 532-6980 or look at the Rec Services website at www.recservices.ksu.edu.

My Favorite Workout

Kim Morrison and Suzanne Leiker love the intramural program at K-State. How much do they enjoy participating? Morrison and Leiker have been a member of the same Intramural team for four years. Each year they compete in eight different sports. "Intramurals offer a lot of interaction with so many different students," said Leiker. "Plus, it's a lot more competitive than pick-up games." Morrison agrees with Leiker about enjoying the competition of intramurals. "I love the fact that I can continue playing sports in a competitive way, but still get to have a good time with my friends," said Morrison. However, intramurals isn't the only reason that Leiker, a senior in Marketing and International Business, comes to the Rec. She also enjoys using the indoor track and doing the circuit workout. "I like to come to the Rec and work out by myself for a while, but then it's fun if I meet up with some of my friends and we can go practice whatever sport we are in season for," said Leiker. Morrison, a senior in Management Information Systems, also enjoys coming to the Rec several times a week. "I usually alternate running and lifting weights every other day," said Morrison. Morrison has extra incentive for coming to the Rec on a daily basis. She is getting married this June. Leiker enjoys working out in order to stay in shape for all the different sports she takes part in each year. Both Morrison and Leiker have some advice for how to enjoy your workouts a lot more. "If you don't really like to workout by yourself, find a team and get involved with intramurals. It's a great way to meet people, get a workout and have a lot of fun," said Leiker. "Go with friends and it makes a workout seem like a lot less work," said Morrison. Morrison and Leiker are both from Scott City, Kansas.

Discount Offered

January and spring semester facility use cards go on sale Wednesday, Dec 20, in the administrative office. A 10% discount off the monthly rate will be given when purchasing a semester card for the months of January-May.

Words of Wellness

Never underestimate the power of a kind word or deed.

For Joe Booe, being an Intramural Supervisor is a great way to display his independence. This senior in Elementary Education is from Cherryvale, Kansas, and has been working at the Rec for two and one-half years. Booe started out as an official and worked as an Assistant Building Supervisor for a year before taking his current job as Intramural Supervisor. "I started officiating because I enjoy it and because it worked well with my schedule," said Booe. "When I heard there was an opening for Supervisor, I applied for it and got it." Booe's favorite part of his job is the independence he enjoys. "I have to be totally reliant on myself at work," said Booe. "Supervisors are responsible for all the decisions that are made at intramural games, so we have to know all the rules and be able to interpret them. We also are the ones in charge of training all of the officials and making the schedules for them." Other important qualities Booe has developed working at the Rec are patience and interpersonal skills. "I have to deal with unhappy people in a diplomatic manner," said Booe. "It is very important that I know how to communicate with them effectively." Booe will graduate in May 2002. He plans to teach in the Manhattan area and intends to continue coaching baseball, football and possibly basketball.

Working as an Intramural Supervisor is exactly the kind of experience John Stous was looking for when he started working at the Rec three years ago. Stous, a senior in Electronic Journalism, is from Holton, Kansas. He began working at the Rec as an official in the fall of 1997, officiated for two years, and was promoted to the position of Intramural Supervisor in the fall of 1999. "I wanted to get in to officiating," said Stous, "and the Rec is an overall fun place to work, so that's where I decided to work." Another aspect he enjoys is the number of people he gets to interact with. "Working at the Rec has allowed me to meet tons of people I wouldn't have gotten to know otherwise," said Stous. However, it was when he got his position as Intramural Supervisor that he found what he was really looking for in a job. "I hope to work in facilities or operations in an Athletic Department at the collegiate level," said Stous. "This job has really enhanced my career plans." Working as an Intramural Supervisor has also enhanced his "people skills." "I have to be able to deal with angry people in a responsible manner," said Stous. "It is tough because I am dealing with my peers who don't always think I know what I am doing. I have to know all the rules and be able to stand firm on the decisions made." After he graduates in May 2001, Stous plans on leaving Manhattan to find a job at another college. However, he hasn't ruled out coming back to work at K-State some day.

We offer 32 sessions per week starting as early as 6:45 a.m. and as late as 8:25 p.m. Our last day for semester exercise sessions will be Friday, December 8. Sessions will resume on the first day of second semester, Thursday, January 11.

Fitness Facts

Osteoporosis Prevention

Did you know that one out of every two postmenopausal women will develop osteoporosis?

Osteoporosis is a gradually developing disease that affects more than 8 million Americans each year. Genetics and lifestyle are the major variables when it comes to risk. Women are more prone to osteoporosis, as are those women with small bones. While these factors cannot be changed, lifestyle can influence risk.

Lifestyle factors which increase risk include: low calcium and vitamin D intake, physical inactivity, smoking and excess alcohol consumption. You can decrease your risks by including three or more servings of dairy products in your daily meal plan, begin an activity plan that includes walking, aerobics and even weight lifting or other weight bearing activities. If you smoke - stop. And limit your alcohol consumption.

Women who are approaching or have gone through menopause should check with their physician about hormone replacement therapy, which may help keep bones dense.

American Dietetic Association

Pool Action

Another great way to make room for some holiday food is to attend the Wildcat Water Workout sessions. Aqua aerobics or deep water jogging sessions are excellent ways to tone your body, burn calories and increase your cardiovascular endurance.

The last day for Wildcat Water Workouts will be Friday, Dec 8. You can continue to use the pool for lap swimming if you don't feel like battling the cold temperatures outside. Swimming for 30-60 minutes not only allows you to burn calories, but it is a super workout for your cardiovascular system. Check the calendar for pool times.

Outdoor Rental Center

The Outdoor Rental Center is closed during the winter months. However, special arrangements can be made by calling the Recreational Services office at 532-6980. Forty-eight hours advance notice is required for any rental over the winter.

Nutrition Notes

Physical Activity: Make it a priority during the holidays. The holiday season is in full swing. Are you looking for extra hours in your day? All the holiday activities can result in a time crunch, but don't cut your exercise to save time. Physical activity can help relieve the stress of the holidays, so start now to develop a more active lifestyle. Shoot for thirty minutes of aerobic activity most days of the week - take a walk after lunch, walk the dog, or walk around the mall before holiday shopping. Use this planned time to relax, organize what you need to do, and generally recharge your spirits. In addition to keeping activity in your routine, remember to stay hydrated. With the colder weather, you lose water as your body stays warm, so include plenty of water-based fluids - eight to twelve cups per day is a good start. Juice and decaffeinated beverages can supplement the water. So enjoy the holiday season by exercising away your stress, not to mention all those calories in holiday goodies.

Volleyball team enters Sweet 16 for 1st time

By MICHAEL NOLL

Kansas State Collegian

K-State's volleyball team entered the annals of Wildcat history by winning their first-and second-round matches of the NCAA tournament and earning their first ever berth in the Sweet 16.

The Cats seized the opportunity to play Wisconsin (30-3) in Madison by defeating Loyola-Chicago and host Pepperdine in Malibu, Calif., this last Friday and Saturday. K-State defeated Loyola in four games, 15-7, 15-4, 6-15, 15-9, and knocked off the No. 15

Waves, also in four, 19-17, 15-13, 10-15, 15-3.

Against Loyola, the Cats were led by team captain and outside hitter Liz Wegner, who tallied 23 kills on 30-percent hitting. In the next day's match against Pepperdine, however, K-State got much of its firepower from a freshman, outside hitter Cari Jensen.

Jensen racked up 24 kills, hit 30.8-percent and dug 14 balls. Junior Lisa Mimick also added 14 kills and 21 digs. The performance by the two was their best all season, head coach Jim McLaughlin said.

"Cari and Lisa both delivered at critical times. They made some big swings and they killed the ball, and then they also made some defensive plays that were outstanding," he said. "It was the most complete game I think we've played as a whole and the most complete game those two have played for sure."

While the score might indicate K-State walked away fairly easily with the win against Pepperdine, the match was hard-fought and demanded perfection in the little things, McLaughlin said.

"It was a tough match," he said. "We knew it was going to be tough because those guys are very good at home. They're like we are at home, but when I looked at the stats, it was comparable. It was a wash. I knew it would come down to little detail plays, and so we prepared for a dogfight, and we hung in there."

K-State prepared for the inevitably close match by not getting emotionally psyched out. The players knew what lay on the line — a Sweet 16 berth — and knew how to handle the pressure, McLaughlin said.

"I was concerned before the game," he said. "They were sky-high, and the only thing I had told them is after the report, which is tactically what we need to do and the assignments we need to stay on, was that we worked real hard all year and we had an opportunity to do something no K-State team has ever done.

"So this was a chance to distinguish ourselves, and I left the room. And they did it. They went hard, and really did it. But then when we got back in, it was like, 'we're not stopping, let's keep going.'"

If the Cats are to keep going, they will have to knock off top-seeded Wisconsin on Friday. While such a matchup certainly is K-State may have failed to capitalize on its second chances Saturday, but the Wildcats will seek redemption once more come Jan. 1, 2001.

After its second defeat to Oklahoma this season as well as its second loss in a Big 12 Championship game, K-State will attempt to reverse its fortunes

New Year's Day, as the Cats are set to compete in the 65th annual Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic.

After falling to Brigham Young 19-15 in the 1997 Cotton Bowl, No. 11/9 K-State (10-3), the Big 12 North Division Champions, will meet head coach Phil Fulmer and No. 21 Tennessee (8-3) of the Southeastern Conference at 10 p.m. CST on FOX.

Officials consider research facility

■ Growth in faculty research spurs K-State to apply for added funds.

Kansas State Collegian

K-State faculty members have received $10 million more than last fiscal year in research funding, according to the Office of Research and Sponsored Programs.

The university is considering building a university research park to help facilitate its success.

The faculty's success denotes a movement in the university, R.W. Trewyn, vice provost for research, said. He said it is moving from a predominantly teaching university into a broader world.

"We're no longer just teaching a student what's in a textbook," Trewyn said. "It's more of a learning and discovery process."

He said it could take up to eight months, after submitting a proposal for funds, to find out whether an award will be issued. Nationally, only 10 to 20 percent of the proposals receive awards.

K-State has an alert faculty dedicated to educating students, said Paul Lowe, assistant vice provost for research and director of the Office of Research and Sponsored Programs and Pre-Award Services.

"The bottom line is they are taking research into the classroom," Lowe said. "Research is a requirement for the tenure process, but our faculty is dedicated to our students. I think they would still pursue cutting-edge research without the requirement."

Trewyn said the sizes of the awards coming in are much bigger than in the past. The trend used to be one faculty member asking for funds, he said.

"Now, there is an emphasis to do things involving multiple disciplines," he said. "By bringing together multiple departments, the awards, by necessity, require

K-State students disenchanted with process

Uncertainty of the presidential election results has caused some K-State students to express their hostility.

Cody Reed, senior in golf course management, said he is sick and tired of hearing about the recounts and wants a president declared soon.

"They've recounted enough," Reed said. "Gore wants to recount until victory, and then all this will never stop."

He said he agreed with Al Gore when he first asked for a recount, but he said it's not logical to recount every ballot.

Gore, who trails by 537 votes in Florida, is asking for a recount of 14,000 disputed ballots from largely Democratic Palm Beach and Miami-Dade counties before the state's 25 electoral votes are awarded. Florida's Supreme Court will make a decision on Gore's proposal.

Reed said the biggest problem with the Florida ballots lies in the voting process. "The machines voters used in Florida are too old and outdated. We need a new process," he said.

Hand-counting is not the answer, Reed said, because machine counts are more impartial.

During Saturday's opening of the Florida trial, a Gore attorney opened a voting machine shipped from Palm Beach County and found a container full of chads. This questioned if the build-up could prevent voters from successfully punching their choice. An expert in rubber was grilled during the trial on whether rubber backing behind ballots in vote machines might have become inflexible and contributed to the failure of punched ballots to drop their chads.

Reed said he thinks the machines are capable of making dimples on ballots, regardless of people's intentions.

"I think everyone wants a more decisive system. People don't want to worry about all this gray area," he said.

Michael Grassinger, senior in management information systems, said all the technicalities and possible flaws make him question the Lawyers for Al Gore and George W. Bush slogged through a second day of testimony about chads, voting machines and the vice president's pleas for a recount, while GOP running mate Dick Cheney said Sunday it's time for Gore to concede. Democrats talked about the possibility of a gracious exit from the presidential contest, but declared, "It's far from over."

Oklahoma man killed in weekend car accident

NEOSHO, Mo. — An Oklahoma man was killed Friday when his pickup overturned in southwest Missouri, according to the Missouri State Highway Patrol. Jason Baker, 18, of Fairland, Okla., was westbound on Missouri Highway 60 in Newton County when his truck left the road, struck an embankment and overturned, the patrol said. The accident happened about 7 a.m. Friday.

University prepares for employees to walk out

SEATTLE — University of Washington graduate teaching assistants spent Saturday making picket signs as administrators braced for a planned walkout on Monday.

Members of the Graduate Student Employee Action Coalition, which represents 1,400 teaching assistants and other graduate employees, are demanding the union be recognized by the university. University administrators say they will not bargain with GSEAC, unless the Legislature specifically authorizes it.

"We're in negotiations with the administration, and unless they recognize and begin bargaining with us, then the strike will be on for Monday," GSEAC spokeswoman Melissa Meade, a graduate student in communications, said.

The union hasn't made any specific demands yet, Meade said Saturday. However, union organizers have raised concerns about wages and health care benefits.

Administrators and university police said they met with GSEAC representatives to discuss ground rules for demonstrations.

"We suspect they'll picket the main gates to campus, may undertake a sit-in or occupation of a facility or two," University Police Capt. Randy Stegmeier said in Saturday's Seattle Times. "We've told them we expect that to happen."

With final exams approaching, a strike could hinder the school's ability to finish grading exams on time. The university relies heavily on graduate students to help professors teach and grade courses.

Some professors have said they will not issue grades during the strike except to students with special needs, such as those applying to law school or with financial aid tied to performance.

University President Richard McCormick has assured students the university has contingency plans. In a letter to faculty members, he suggested professors use final exams that could be graded quickly.

KAREN MIKOLS/Collegian

Santa Claus (Brad Davis, senior in construction science and management) listens as Stephanie Doner, 2, tells him about a doll she wants for Christmas. Davis saw an ad in the newspaper last year and decided to apply. This is Davis' second Christmas as Santa at Manhattan Town Center.

By JESSICA PITTS

Kansas State Collegian

Brad Davis has to work hard to fill the boots of the most-known icon of the Christmas season.

Davis, senior in construction science and management, works as a Santa Claus in the Manhattan Town Center during the holidays.

"I really try and be upbeat and festive so that the people respond to me," Davis said. "I get into character when I put on the Santa suit. I become the character by making my voice more of a hearty tone, and I try and be friendly to shoppers and the kids. By hearing me yell out 'Merry Christmas' and 'Ho, ho, ho,' hopefully people will get in the holiday spirit."

Davis is employed by Reflections Photography and is in his second year of playing Santa.

"I responded to an ad last year in the newspaper, and then they called me back for the second year," he said. "I was happy I was offered the job again because it is something I really enjoy."

Bobby Nixon, co-owner of Reflections Photography, said he asked Davis to work again this year because of how well he plays the role of Santa.

"He is very outgoing and is really good with the kids," Nixon said. "I have never seen him without a smile on his face, which is perfect for the role. He is just a generally happy person and that rubs off on the kids that he comes in contact with."

Davis said the children are his favorite part of the job.

"They are the number one reason I do this," he said. "They are great to be around because of how funny and innocent they are. They love Christmas, which makes my job fun."

Davis said he tries to follow the basic Santa routine while he is working.

"The kids usually come and sit on my lap, and I try to make small talk with them," he said. "I ask them if they have been good and what they want for Christmas, and then we most likely take a picture together."

"It goes pretty fast because the mom usually takes them away before I can get to into it."

Stephanie Doner, Manhattan resident, took her children, Taylor, 2, and Alec, 4, to the Manhattan Town Center on Saturday to visit Santa.

"It is a yearly event," she said. "They really get excited to see him."

Taylor said she told Santa she wanted a doll for Christmas.

"I told him I wanted a dollie," she said. "And then he said 'Ho, Ho, Ho.'"

Alec spoke about his sister during his visit with Santa.

"I told him I was good, but my sister wasn't," he said. "Then he gave us a candy."

Alec asked for a bow and arrow and a blow-gun from Santa while his mom rolled her eyes in the background.

"I hope Santa doesn't grant that wish," she said.

Davis said the children generally ask for the same type of gifts from Santa.

"Last year, the big thing was Pokemon, and this year it's scooters. Everyone wants one," he said. "They ask for the basics, too — girls ask for Barbie and boys tend to go towards the cars and trucks."

Davis said he also enjoys his holiday job because he usually does not have to deal with children who cry.

"That is what the Santa's helper and the parents are for," he said. "They help stop the crying. I just sit there and smile, but there is usually not that many that get upset."

"I would say only 25 percent get scared. Sometimes we just take the picture real fast with them crying."

The worst part of Davis' job is the parents, he said.

"They really are sometimes a pain in the butt," Davis said. "They are pushy, and they try and force the kids to smile. It makes it hard when they are rushing the kids through because it doesn't give me a chance to have fun with them. That is the best part of the job having fun with the kids."

Union bookstore angel tree to help area youth

By ERIN DEHN

Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Student Union Bookstore, in cooperation with the Flint Hills Breadbasket, will bring area children a special gift — the gift of reading.

An angel tree will be displayed in the bookstore until Dec. 15. One hundred paper angels cover the tree, each representing a child in need. The child's first name, sex and age is included on each angel.

"It's a way to help promote literacy and make sure all children have a chance to own books," said Von O'Neil, general book buyer for the store.

The response from the bookstore employees and staff has been great, O'Neil said of the program that has existed for more than five years.

"It's something different — it's unique to a bookstore," she said.

The process is simple. A person chooses an angel from the tree and then purchases a book in the bookstore for that child. A 25 percent discount will be given to books purchased for the angel tree.

Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager, said employees will assist those who don't have time to pick out the book. The bookstore then will wrap the book and deliver the gifts to the Flint Hills Breadbasket. Once an angel is chosen, it will be replaced with a gold star.

"In most situations, these children are in homes where books are not a necessity," Snyder said. "It's a lasting gift."

Shirley Bramhall, executive director of the Breadbasket, offered advice for those picking out books for a child.

"If it's a book you loved, I can guarantee those children will love it," she said.

The recipients get their books, along with other donated gifts, during a celebration at the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"It looks like Santa's workshop,"

Bramhall said. "I live for that day."

Bramhall said the bookstore angel tree differs from other angel trees in that it promotes something today's families have lost sight of — quality family time.

"What can I say?" Bramhall said. "The gift of reading and sitting down and reading to your children, wow, what a deal."

Cat fans should spend new year at Cotton Bowl

We are going to the Big D and we do mean Dallas.

Cotton Bowl, here we come.

New Year's Day will mark the correct start of the actual millennium for most people. However, that day will have a much more profound impact for those who are K-State football fans.

That day marks the chance for the pride of the purple to settle the score after a previous loss at the Cotton Bowl to BYU. This time, we will be facing Tennessee.

Dallas is a lot closer destination than last year's Holiday Bowl in San Diego. More students and fans should be willing to make the trek to support our football team.

Even if you are not fortunate enough to have tickets, you can still show your support by going to various functions that will be occurring in Dallas (even if those various functions happen in the bars).

K-State has had a rocky season this year, and it is essential that their fans stick by their team. Showing support by driving to Texas is one of the many ways that you can do this.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

Did everyone notice how awesome our marching band looked in those matching winter coats? Are you sure that Oklahoma just didn't give instruments to random fans? That's what it looked like to me.

After taking into account how many meals I missed, I have spent an average of $6.25 on each meal I eat in the Dining Hall. I think for $6.25, I should be able to get my meal just about any way I want it. Is it really that big of a deal to ask them to substitute another piece of toast for the roast beef it was supposed to come with?

We don't have to worry about Dick Cheney's heart condition. Al Gore has made it abundantly clear over the last three weeks that the vice president doesn't do anything, anyway.

Hey, athletes — I attend my own classes, do my own homework, have a job to support the amount of money I pay to attend this university, represent thousands of students on a regional and national level, and put up with your cocky attitude. Enough said.

Sore Loserman? I think so.

When the basketball team proves their worth, then they can have a towel guy.

If the damn Okie would've checked, he would have known its called Wagner Field. Of course, what can you expect from an OU fan?

This message is for Coach Snyder and the football team. Please try to ignore the people who call in to whine about athletics and know that there are thousands of people in Manhattan, in Kansas and in the whole country who appreciate your hard work and are very proud of you.

I am naming my first kid Towel Guy. You go, Towel Guy.

Wanted: strong safety. Cooper need not apply.

Great effort, K-State, but it wasn't good enough. Get 'em in the Cotton Bowl, baby.

Finals week leaves no time for slacking off

I can feel it slipping away.

Remnants of a once-strong work ethic lie scattered in funny shapes as my brain starts that inevitable shrinking. My willpower is melting into poop.

At this point, I have completed more than 100 hours of classes, and I feel no smarter. If anything, I'm not sure I could beat my terrier at a game of chess. I would have had a fighting chance back in high school.

I have too many classes under my belt that have not enriched me.

Yup, I am the victim of pseudo learning, and I suspect a few others are, as well.

I used to think three or four years ago, you know. Yup, assign me a tiny story on the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area, and I'd write a book on it, whether my editor wanted me to or not. Give me a test, and I'd already have two weeks of studying behind me to complete it with cool resolve before moving on to the next task.

Somewhere along the line, however, the studying stopped happening and didn't really do any good when it did. At some point, an observant student's common sense starts to bubble to the surface and he/she makes conclusions about the existence of pseudo learning. Mine were as follows: (1) You know nothing and still ace the test; (2) you know everything and still bomb the test; (3) you bomb an entire course and the world fails to explode and (4) you would probably be learning more if you sat at home all day watching cable.

As a result, I have become my own greatest nemesis and am currently undoing all the GPA work from my first three years. I'm not going to jinx myself by using the b-word (rhymes with "academic turnout"), but I'm starting to suspect.

These days I study for my tests at least a heavy five minutes before they hand out the scantrons. Naturally, I now associate tests with coerced confessions under a spotlight.

"Tell me about cystine bonds and how they relate to protein configurations."

"I don't know nothin'."

WHAP! I'm down to a "C-" at this point, and I think a tooth is loose.

"Describe the conclusion of chapter 12 in the text."

"We have a text?"

WHACK! Hmmm... perhaps I can still pass with the extra credit question.

Now, I love cystine bonds and chapter 12 as much as the next guy, but being aware of them has done very little to improve my daily life. I've worked two summer internships outside of K-State so far. Neither cystine bonds nor chapter 12 came up, but I would have been allowed to use a book if they had. Working in the outside world is a fascinating discovery of how much stuff you really don't need to know or will need to relearn.

Don't get me wrong. One super power I have developed in nearly five years of college is the ability to fill out a bubble sheet under any conditions — blinded, under water, upside down. I've been thinking of moving to Florida in time for the next election to educate the locals. Sort of like the Voting Peace Corps.

I still hand in assignments — at the last possible, conceivable, slip-through-the-door-as-it-closes minute. Fortunately, I usually write them under the gleeful style provided by sleep deprivation, so graders are at least amused.

Granted, I'm not doing anything useful with the extra time on my hands. I invest most of it procrastinating about the stuff I should be doing. Generally, time spent fleeing useless tasks is the best time in the world.

It would seem others are also on the run. When I head to Hale Library for my two- to three-hour nap, competition is fierce for those wonderful little purple couches. When I go to the K-State Student Union arcade to shoot zombies, the bowling lanes are paying for the rest of the building.

Ever seen your fellow students dive across a busy intersection, apparently lost to a solid faith in god, pedestrian rights or anti-lock brakes? These aren't healthy people.

All you need is a lot of rest. Nothing else!

In one of my large lecture classes, I tried to see what the person on one side of me thought. He was busy filling out an employment application. The lady on the other side looked like she was in a good chapter of something by Stephen King. Perhaps a mass lecture with no two-way discussion and the notes already published in full isn't the best way to command attention. Unless you like the feeling you've been plugged into the Matrix. I prefer conversation.

It still beats another math class. I once had, where the curve translated into "65 percent and above equals an

A." I'm pretty sure a cabbage in a baseball cap sitting in the third row squeaked in a "C."

Ladies and gentlemen, nothing kills a healthier brain faster than the college experience if you see it as "meeting requirements."

I'm lucky that most of my classes in the past, and most of my current ones, are good ones. There are still instructors who really do teach useful information and give you skills to use out of school. Get all you can from them, and let them know you appreciate it. I just remember the duds so much more vividly.

The problem is that the system is based upon rushing through the book with no regard to whom is learning it and usually asking you to puke up results on the beloved "multiple guess" scantron.

Enjoy finals week, folks. That's probably the last time you and most of this data will be on familiar terms.

I for one will be laying a memorial bottle of bourbon on Algernon's grave. It was nice to be smart for just a little while.

Knowledge gained during time in college gained outside classrooms

All the best things I learned in college, I learned outside of the classroom.

I learned that few of the friends you kept from your high school days will be around forever and those who you thought you wouldn't be able to carry on without, well, you'll do just fine without them. The friends you've made here, you'll have a lot more in common with and you somehow always will find new and interesting stuff to debate.

I learned that no matter how badly you want to save someone, sometimes you have to save yourself first. That the person you want to save has to be ready to accept your life preserver before you throw it to them. That sometimes you have to know when to hold 'em, know when to fold 'em, know when to walk away and know when to run.

I learned that it is easy to identify the problems of others, but sometimes it is difficult to find fault in ourselves.

I learned that even when your heart is breaking and it seems like the world will come to an end, that somehow you carry on. And you make it. In the end you can take what you've learned from the relationship and become a better person for it.

I learned that the world is a lot better place than the cynics would like to admit. That it is a crummiest place than the optimists would like to admit. That it is exactly what you make of it. Your attitude affects your success and failures more than you probably think.

I learned that you should accept your failures with dignity, accept your wins with humility and pass the blame only when you won't be caught. I learned that there are things that you just can't joke about, and I sometimes have a hard time figuring out what they are.

I learned that just between us really means just between us. That telling the most insignificant piece of information can get you in a lot of trouble and that gossip travels like wildfire. That an apology can go far, but only if you really mean it.

I learned that the risk takers are the ones who usually end up gone first, but they are the ones who enjoyed the journey most. That if you ask for something the worst thing that can happen is denial. That the best is always around the corner.

I learned that it really does take all kinds. We can appreciate and accept the differences in each of us. That coming from a small town doesn't mean we keep small town ideals. The jobs that carry the least respect often mean the most to the success of the whole.

I learned that occasionally my parents are right. That they aren't nearly as backward as I thought. I am even, every now and again, although not often, wrong. That day by day, I am becoming more like them than I like to admit. That they were pretty good role models.

I learned that I still have so much to learn.

Communication with GTAs important when complaining

Editor,

As a student and a human being, I know first-hand how easy it is to complain about something, but then do nothing about it. For example, I know how easy it is for students to complain about GTAs, especially international GTAs. But how many of us who have complaints actually speak to the GTA about them? Those who do and do it calmly (calmly being the key word here), are definitely in the minority.

Now, as students, if there is something that we can do better than complaining it's making up excuses. There are numerous excuses we have as to why we don't talk to the GTAs about troubles that we are having in their classes. One of our top excuses is: "Nothing is going to change, so why should I bother?" Well, we're right. Nothing is going to change if we don't bother. So how can we solve this problem?

I call it a GTASC sheet. GTASC stands for Graduate Teaching Assistant Student Communication. (It has such a nice flow to it, don't you think?) The GTASC sheet will allow students to respond to four main problems that may be making it difficult to understand and learn in class. The first two problems are volume and speed. The third problem is explanation. Are the GTAs too general (they take five seconds to explain a trig problem) or are they too detailed (they take ten minutes to explain how they want you to put your name on your papers). The fourth problem is eye contact. How many of us like going to class and having the GTA talk to the board the entire time? The GTASC sheet will also provide an area for students to explain any other reasons as to why they are having problems understanding and learning from the GTA. GTASC sheets would be located in every department office all semester long. All the student would have to do is go in, fill it out, and put it in the GTAs mailbox.

I feel that GTASC sheets would greatly improve student/GTA communication. It's quick and easy to fill out, it's anonymous, and it's available all semester long. It may not solve all the problems that we might have with our GTAs, but it's certainly better than doing nothing.

Country's economic future uncertain with Clinton exit

By MARTIN CRUTSINGER
The Associated Press

WASHINGTON D.C. — President Clinton might be taking more with him than his suitcase when he leaves the White House on Jan. 20.

His amazing run of luck with the economy seems to be disappearing as well, right on cue with the end of his second term.

That means his successor, either George W. Bush or Al Gore, will have to navigate stormier seas. Some forecasters are even worried about a recession next year — a problem Clinton never had to confront as he presided over a record stretch, now in its 10th year, of uninterrupted economic growth.

"However one looks at it, the economic data, recently, have been quite negative and the possibility of a serious hard landing is rising," said Allen Sinai, chief economist at Decision Economics in New York.

While Sinai said he believed the chances of an outright recession — where economic growth actually contracts — are still small, he was concerned about a prolonged period of weak growth that would translate into a rising unemployment rate.

David Levy, an economist at Bard College in Annandale-on-Hudson, N.Y., was even more pessimistic, putting the odds of a full-fledged recession next year at 70 percent.

Things were not supposed to turn out this way. The overwhelming view among economists had been that the United States was headed for a soft landing in which a series of interest rate increases by the Federal Reserve would slow economic growth enough to keep inflation in check without tipping the country into a recession.

But since the Nov. 7 election, while the country has been transfixed by the ballot battle in Florida, the economic ship of state has been springing leaks.

Bazaar proceeds to benefit Hale Library

By ANGIE JOHNSON
Kansas State Collegian

If you're clueless about what to get your family and friends for Christmas, Hale Library suggests stopping by and checking out their variety of affordable gifts.

The Friends of the K-State Library will be host to their annual Hale Library Holiday Bazaar, featuring gifts such as books, games and other items. All proceeds made from the event will be given to the library.

"We want to provide students with an opportunity to purchase nice presents at a low price, and it is all for a wonderful purpose," Manhattan mayor Karen McCulloh said.

The sale began Nov. 30 and will run until Dec. 5, excluding Saturday. It will be set up on the second floor behind the library help desk and will look similar to a garage sale.

"We like to call it our sale of stuff because there are such unique things that everyone can have an interest in," McCulloh said.

All items for the bazaar have been donated by Friends members and other community members. The majority of the items are either brand new or in top condition. The prices range from only five to 10 dollars.

"Some of the sale items are handmade, specifically made for the bazaar or just no longer needed," said Diane Dollar, professor emerita in the Department of Art. "It truly is and always has been a lovely selection of gifts at all price ranges."

The Friends want to stress that the holiday sale does not only feature books, but a variety of items. Along with better books, they will be selling candles, napkins, wreaths and stockings, calendars, the new Hale Library T-shirts, international gifts and more.

"You can find small things to give to a roommate or a distant friend, or maybe even something you know your Mom or Dad would adore," Dollar said.

Friends of the K-State libraries, will be host to the annual bazaar, consists of a board of 20 people, with over 450 members, including members of the community and alumni. They are instrumental in helping Hale make money and become successful.

"We want students to feel proud of their library and the wonderful facility it is and want to go there to learn," Karen Rogers, president of Friends, said.

The bazaar is only one way Friends works to promote a positive image and work with students.

Along with another project, they are working on to enhance the juvenile literature collection at Hale, they are also interested in making Hale a place where students and alumni want to be.

"The bazaar is another arm of fund raising that our organization does for support, and we hope to be even more successful than years past," Rogers said.

"We appreciate every bowl that's in existence, and we've played in quite a few, as Tennessee has," head coach Bill Snyder said Sunday. "All bowls are very positive experiences for young people, but there is a special uniqueness about playing on New Year's Day."

"The tradition of it, I think, dates back almost throughout time and players have grown up with that."

Fred McClure, chairman of the Cotton Bowl Athletic Association, said he's extremely excited about this year's bowl game.

"We're putting two teams together that have never played each other and I think that's going to make it a great, wonderful experience for us here in Dallas, Texas, and hopefully for the many fans of Kansas State University and the University of Tennessee," he said.

K-State Director of Athletics Max Urick said he feels very honored for K-State and its football squad to receive an invitation to the Cotton Bowl, but he also sees the quality of opponent as a definite positive.

"I think the excitement of playing Tennessee will give an added spark to our fans and play a team that distincts itself over time with a long and storied tradition," Urick said. "The football heroes and legends that have come out of Tennessee is really kind of a bonus for all our people to become better acquainted with."

Snyder echoed Urick's sentiments.

"We're honored to have the opportunity to be in Dallas again for our second trip there. We're honored to have the opportunity to play a great program and a great team put together by Coach Fulmer and his staff and his players," he said. "It's certainly one of the truly great traditions programs in the country of all-time, and will be a special opportunity for the entirety of our program."

However, Rick Baker, president and executive director of the Cotton Bowl, said tickets are expected to sell fast. Each school will be distributed 12,000 tickets, with probably another 10-12,000 available to the general public.

"With both universities having great followings," Baker said, "we feel certain they will be snatched up pretty quickly this week."

As a Florida circuit judge promised a speedy resolution to Gore's historic election protest, the vice president braced for the next round of legal action and attended church, where he heard a sermon titled, "A Time For Waiting."

It was an apt metaphor for the longest, closest presidential contest in 124 years. Gore, testing Americans' willingness to wait as he exhausts his legal options, conducted an interview with CBS's "60 Minutes" as part of a personalized public relations blitz.

"At the end of the day, when all processes have taken place, if George Bush is sworn in as president he'll be my president. He'll be America's president," Gore said.

Nearly a month after Election Day, Cheney led a herd of Bush and Gore allies to the Sunday news shows. "I do think that it's time for him to concede," he told NBC. "So far, he's chosen not to do that — to pursue other avenues — and clearly that's his prerogative. But I think ... history would regard him in a better light if he were to bring this to a close."

Gore allies said he won't consider quitting before Judge N. Sanders Sauls rules on his request for hand recounts in two counties, and the Florida Supreme Court settles the appeal that undoubtedly will be lodged by the losing side. The vice president has one other lifeline: the U.S. Supreme Court is considering the case in a separate appeal filed by Bush.

Gore lieutenant Warren Christopher also mentioned a Democratic lawsuit in Seminole County, where GOP officials were allowed to add information to thousands of absentee ballot applications already submitted to election officials. Their options, running low, Gore aides are pinning more of their hopes on the case in east Florida.

"It's the late innings," said Christopher on CBS, "but it's far from over." The former secretary of state, also appearing on CNN, charged that Cheney "is trying to hurry history along."

And yet the question kept coming: When would Gore concede?

"I can assure you that the vice president, when the time comes, will concede in a very gracious way. He understands his obligations to the people of the country," Christopher said, not predicting when that time would come.

"It depends upon when the Florida courts rule. The date of December 12, of course, is an important date," he said.

current vote results.

"If all voters in the U.S. used scantrons, would the numbers add up totally different?" Grassinger said. "That's something, I guess, we'll never know."

Bush's narrow margin of victory has caused Jonas Stewart, senior in political science, to think more recounts are necessary, Stewart said.

"I know there was at least 10,000 votes not counted because of minute reasons," Stewart said. "That's a lot of voices unheard."

Stewart said he thinks if ballots have any sort of clear mark on one certain person, they should be counted.

"We shouldn't allow inconsistencies to affect the election," he said.

He said that recent attitudes towards Gore have frustrated him.

"People are saying that Gore is a sore loser, but if the situation was reversed those people criticizing would be acting the opposite way," Stewart said. "Everyone needs to look at the broad picture and not just side with who they voted for."

more money."

Charles Walker, professor in the Department of Grain Science and Industry, recently was awarded $40,000 from Kraft Foods to conduct a pasta ingredient study.

He said the study will explore cheaper and faster ways of producing pasta for Kraft.

He said the majority of the money he received will go toward graduate student stipends. He utilizes outside sources for his research because of a lack of resources at K-State, he said.

"At any university, it is always a problem having enough available facilities in quantity and quality," Walker said.

If K-State does not expand its research facilities, it cannot grow, he said. He said there is a need for more laboratories, equipment and offices to do research in an effective manner.

"We have experienced almost a three-fold increase. The vast majority goes into people," he said. "Our increase in lab facilities only went up 10 percent. You can only cram in so many people."

A university research park would help alleviate the constraints on campus, he said.

He said the park would only serve to do good by offering more space and flexibility for the school.

Trewyn said plans for the park are in progress. The biggest obstacles are money and selecting a property sight, he said.

He said one of the greatest benefits of the park would be for students.

"It can be a real advantage to the institution by providing local job opportunities for students and graduates. Some students would not have to relocate after graduation to find a job," he said.

daunting, there is no reason K-State cannot play with the Badgers.

"The only time I'm ever concerned as a coach is when I go into a match thinking we've got to overachieve, play above our norm," McLaughlin said. "But right now our norm is as good as the top 16 teams in the country — maybe not the top four — but the top 16 for sure."

To prepare, the Cats will be given a day off today while the coaches analyze Wisconsin's tendencies.

"We're going to start on Wisconsin tonight," McLaughlin said Sunday. "We've already got all the numbers, and we're ready to go tomorrow morning. We're taking tomorrow off. We won't let them touch a volleyball, and then Tuesday we'll go back to work."

DOUBLE TROUBLE

Cats eluded once more in Sooner rematch

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

KANSAS CITY, MO. — So much for not being able to beat a team twice in the same season.

In Saturday night's Big 12 Championship, top-ranked Oklahoma (12-0) did just that, edging out No. 7/8 K-State (10-3) 27-24 in front of a record-crowd of 79,655 at Arrowhead Stadium.

"My heart just broke," senior cornerback Dyshod Carter said. "I thought we had the game won early on, and then when you see the quarterback take a kneel down, you know it's not for you — it's for their benefit. It just hurt, it hurt the whole team."

It wasn't the only time the Sooners have inflicted pain on the Cats this season, either. On Oct. 14, Oklahoma spoiled K-State's undefeated 6-0 record with a 41-31 win in Manhattan.

However, head coach Bill Snyder's initial reaction of the game was quite brief.

"Well, I don't have very much to say. Obviously, we didn't play well enough to win the ball game," he said Saturday. "I wish Oklahoma the very best of good fortune, and I hope they win a national championship for the Big 12 Conference."

"They're an excellent football team, and we just weren't good enough on this given night to make a difference in the ball game."

One big difference came on the first play of the fourth quarter, with the score knotted at 17. OU faced a 4th-and-1 from K-State's 39-yard line, when quarterback Josh Heupel ran option left and pitched the ball to tailback Quentin Griffin, who scooted down the sideline for 22 yards. The play set up Heupel's 17-yard TD strike to wide-out Andre Woolfolk, giving the Sooners a 24-17 lead with 14:24 to play.

Snyder said the play isn't surprising to him in retrospect, but might have been at the time.

"That was a nice call," he said. "We were there to try to stop the sneak, and obviously you can't do that and stop the option both — and we didn't. So it was a chess match and a guessing game, and we didn't guess correctly."

Nevertheless, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the defense was prepared for any situation, but strong safety Jon McGraw's injury might have been the Cats' demise, as the junior couldn't fight off the block of OU fullback Seth Littrell, which sprung Griffin.

"Bless Jon McGraw's heart — he was doing everything he could, but he couldn't use his right arm," Bennett said. "Just with his experience, he wanted to play, and I wanted to play him, and it probably wasn't a good decision. I thought at that point, we could have stopped that play."

Besides, it wasn't as if K-State hadn't seen the option this year in short yardage situations, Bennett said.

"We worked that play. We worked it because Texas A&M had run it successfully against us. I would tell you if it was a new play," he said. "Chris Johnson did a great job on the pitch, almost made him fumble the pitch, and Jon just couldn't get off the block, couldn't separate with his arm, and it was a big play."

"No doubt, that was a back-breaker."

It was a call offensive coordinator Mark Mangino had been wanting to make all year.

"We've worked on the option since last spring, and we've dabbled with it a couple times in goal line, but we've never ran it out on the field. And I wanted to do it, wanted to do it, but I was always hesitant because I didn't want Josh to take a shot by a defensive end," Mangino said Saturday.

"But you know, the last few weeks he's run so well with the ball that I felt if there's ever a night where we needed to use the option, it would be tonight because Kansas State, in short yardage situations, just loads the box up. We thought if we could wall everything off and run the option, it could be a good play for us against them, and it turned out to be an excellent play."

An excellent play it was, and when the Cats regained possession, the Sooner defense took control by stalling K-State's next three offensive drives, two of which were three-and-outs.

OU then added a 46-yard field goal by Tim Duncan to extend the lead to 10 with 1:25 to play, but head coach Bob Stoops admitted he almost didn't give his kicker that chance.

"We were about to go for it, and then I just thought he'd make it," Stoops said. "I just had that feeling, and maybe I just had a little intuition."

That premonition paid off for Oklahoma, as quarterback Jonathan Beasley marched K-State down the field on its next drive. The senior found wide-out Quincy Morgan in the end zone from 16 yards out to cut the OU lead to 27-24, but it was too late, as only six seconds remained on the clock.

Controversial call hurts Cats' chances

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

An official's call with less than three minutes to play in the third quarter might have decided the game.

After Ben Leber's linebacker blitz dropped Oklahoma quarterback Josh Heupel back at their own 40-yard line, the Sooners were faced with a second-down and a long 20.

OU's signal-caller dropped back in the pocket and looked left, releasing the ball to intended receiver Matt Anderson, who was blanketed by K-State's Jarrod Cooper. The senior strong safety hit the tight end before the ball arrived, and freshman linebacker Terry Pierce wound up with the interception, but a yellow flag could be seen flying through the brisk December air.

Pass interference.

Heupel's throw appeared to be tipped at the line of scrimmage by defensive tackle DeVane Robinson, which would negate any kind of interference penalty, but the officiating crew didn't see that as the case.

Cooper was flagged for 15 yards, giving Oklahoma an automatic first down at K-State's 48-yard line. The Sooners would take full advantage, finding the end zone five plays later to give OU a 24-17 lead, one they would not relinquish.

Head coach Bill Snyder said he spoke to the referees about the call on the field.

"The explanation given to me was that it was interference, that he had hit the receiver before the pass had been tipped," Snyder said. "That's what I was told."

However, defensive end Monty Beisel preferred visual redemption over hearsay, although he did hear the official's opinion on whether Cooper interfered on the play.

"According to the referee he did, and he didn't hear the tip. (The official) came back, and a few plays later, he did actually apologize to DeVane and asked him if he did tip it," Beisel said. "So there actually was a tip. I saw it on the big screen, and he came back a few plays later and admitted it."

Defense holds strong against OU

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

Oklahoma might have the leading Heisman candidate in quarterback Josh Heupel and an offense that averages 440 yards per game, but on the Sooners' first possession Saturday night, they couldn't have scored a touchdown if the end zone was within spitting distance.

Actually, the end zone was four yards away, but Oklahoma failed on four tries from that distance after recovering a Beasley fumble at the 27-yard line.

In fact, K-State's defense would keep the Heupel herd to just 85 yards in the entire first half, a stat that made defensive coordinator Phil Bennett very proud.

"I thought our kids played hard. They're a good offense, as everybody knows, but I think we're a pretty good defense, too," he said. "I was proud of the kids — we weren't perfect — but I thought we looked like a defense that can play with anybody in the country, which we can."

And Bennett had several words for his squad after playing well and still losing.

"I told them I was proud of them. I told them I thought they gave a heck of an effort, and I thought it was a game we could've won," he said. "If you hold a team to around 300 yards, especially a team like that, you should have a chance to win."

That thought offers small comfort to K-State defenders, though, who couldn't help but think that, if not for them, the game might have been out of reach early in the contest, defensive end Chris Johnson said.

"I'm disappointed. I feel that we came to play on defense," he said Saturday. "We had a great stance, we just couldn't get everything working on all cylinders today. Seems like the only thing that kept us in all day was defense."

"It's very disappointing — senior year, you make it back to the Big 12 Championship and you don't finish it again. You can't beat yourself up, especially since, I felt, we played a pretty sound game on defense. It's just, I guess, how the cookie crumbles."

Eventually, K-State's defense began to crumble as well. Because of the offense's inability to move the ball and eat up minutes on the clock, the defense was on the field for two-thirds of the third quarter. The Cats just wore down, defensive end Monty Beisel said.

"You're out there so many plays, and eventually they're going to start making some third down conversions," he said. "And they did that — it's tough."

Oklahoma also picked out the one defensive matchup in their favor — Trent Smith, a 6-foot-5 tight end, versus Jarrod Cooper, 6-foot-1 Cat strong safety.

"Trent Smith's a very athletic guy that can go up for the ball, and we felt like Cooper, he's a very, very good player, but his forte is run support, and he's more of a run support guy than he is a cover guy," Oklahoma offensive coordinator Mark Mangino said, "and we thought we could get a matchup there with him. He's an excellent player, though — we just felt Trent Smith's athletic."

The matchup worked, as Smith would finish the night with a Big XII Championship Game record of eight catches for 96 yards. Time after time, Heupel was able to connect with Smith on crossing routes.

"Smith was just blocking me out with his body. I couldn't see around him," Cooper said. "Heupel was just throwing it in the right spot. I couldn't get around him. It's not that I couldn't do it, I just wasn't on my A game today."

"I might have been thinking to much. Sometimes when I go in a game, and I'm trying to... I'm not making excuses, whatever. I'm not sure. There's no excuses."

Punting game falters in loss

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

"Our punt team absolutely killed us."

For defensive coordinator Phil Bennett, the game was that simple. "In a championship game, you cannot win with a blocked punt, giving them the ball where we gave them," he said.

Where the Cats gave Oklahoma the ball was on their own 17-yard line with 4:02 remaining in the first half. Three plays later, Sooners quarterback Josh Heupel completed a one-yard touchdown pass to tight end Trent Smith to tie the game up at 10-10.

K-State would never regain the lead.

The Cats wouldn't learn from their special teams mistake, either. On their next possession, after gaining three yards in three plays, punter Travis Brown mishandled a bounced snap from long snapper Neil Gosch and was tackled for a four-yard loss.

On K-State's other eight punts, a combined three punters Brown, Jared Brite and Jonathan Beasley booted the ball for a 32-yard average. That number could have been far less, too, but oftentimes the punts were so short that the Oklahoma return man couldn't field the ball, and the ball bounced another 10 yards down the field.

"Obviously, we've got some problems there," head coach Bill Snyder said. "That's four games in a row that we've had a punt blocked. And there was more to it than just the punt block. We mishandled and turned the ball over at mid-field and, in both cases, they turned into points. We're not very pleased with that."

Of course, the solution to K-State's punting woes is simple — avoid fourth downs. But to do that, the Cats needed to move the ball, a task much easier said than done Saturday night.

"As an offense, we've got to go out there, regardless if it's our punt team or our defense, we've got to keep them off the field, and we didn't do that today," Beasley said. "Oklahoma did a great job of stuffing what we were doing, and that's about it."

The lone bright spot in K-State's offensive attack was fullback Rocky Cartwright, who bowled through the Sooners defense for 48 yards on seven carries. No Oklahoma defender could bring Cartwright down single-handedly — even first team All-American linebacker Rocky Calmus bounced off the stocky junior.

"He's a little bowling ball. He's short and wide, and it's hard to get your arms around him," Calmus said. "Players that are built like that, no matter how good or bad they are, they're hard to take down. He had a good game."

The Sooners would keep "Bowling Ball" Cartwright from completing a perfect game, however, as he only gained one yard on two carries in the second half.

That inability to move the ball, though, was as much K-State's fault as Oklahoma's, Snyder said.

"In either half, we really didn't have any consistency with it, not well enough to maintain any drives. Quincy Morgan got three or four plays in the ball game. That's certainly not enough for us to win against a good football team."

Casting a Clone

Schwarzenegger's newest predictable, similar to past films

Review by CORBIN H. CRABLE
Kansas State Collegian

It's another case of deja vu. Arnold Schwarzenegger's new film, "The 6th Day," is a bit too reminiscent of, oh, let's say, every other science fiction/adventure/thriller movie he's ever done. Thank goodness the plot actually makes you think somewhat, which is the only good thing I can say about this disappointment of a film.

Schwarzenegger plays Adam Gibson, a man who, in the not-too-distant future, finds out he has been cloned by the government. Now, he must find a way to win back his wife (Wendy Crewson, "Air Force One") and daughter, as well as the rest of his life, and to stop the men behind the clones (Robert Duvall, Michael Rapaport and Tony Goldwyn) from taking over the world.

This movie deals with the very real issue of human cloning, and the moral questions it raises draws you into the topic. Unfortunately, the few anti-cloning religious zealots who appear in the movie have very little screen time, and they probably would have made better adversaries than the actual villains.

This movie is a "clone" itself. It's as if the writers actually sat down and said, "Hey, let's do 'Total Recall' again, but this time let's make it suck!" Mission accomplished, folks.

When one looks at the caliber of actors in "The 6th Day," Duvall carries them well. Schwarzenegger, if he hasn't yet realized he's getting too old for these tired roles, should perhaps look into infomercials or the like for retirement, because he sure as hell can't act. The special effects and futuristic props aren't enough to save the film because we've seen most of them before.

The plot, and its relevancy to all of us, is the one thing that maybe makes it worth seeing when it's been out on video for a while.

As for Schwarzenegger, meanwhile, maybe a remake of "Kindergarten Cop" will boost his career again. Seeing a horde of unruly seven year olds take Arnold down would be more exciting than "The 6th Day," anyway.

McCutcheon captivates audience

Manhattan residents had a rare treat Saturday night. Folk performer John McCutcheon captivated a BirdHouse audience at the Manhattan Arts Center for nearly three hours with an incredible variety of songs and stories.

McCutcheon is, by far, one of the most talented singer/songwriters of his time. He has mastered, if not defined, the art of folk singing.

The multi-instrumentalist captivated every member of the audience with his ability to tell a story with a song.

His storytelling, rich with imagery, adds another dimension to his songs enabling him to connect to his audience that much more.

McCutcheon takes the most simplistic ideas, experiences or the familiar, and turns them into magical songs that people of all ages can enjoy.

McCutcheon focuses on the spirit of hard-working people and the simple life, never overlooking or taking anybody for granted. He also addresses newspaper headlines, stimulating thought but also a few laughs at the same time.

His songs are timeless. They are ones to be passed down from generation to generation without ever becoming outdated.

One of the most versatile musicians ever, McCutcheon delivered a concert that was outstanding and impressive. He was one of the most humble and genuine performers I have ever seen.

The only drawback to the evening was that it had to end.

Review by KEN WELLS

Imagine being in the same conference as a completely dominating team. No matter how far your team comes or how good you eventually are, there's still that shadow over your accomplishments, those insisting you'll never be as good as the big boy on the block.

989 Sports understands this all too well. Constantly relegated to second-place status against the sports gaming juggernaut of EA Sports, 989 keeps punching up its console gaming titles, raising its own bar and this year's college football offering is a very pleasant result.

"NCAA GameBreaker 2001" implements its own career coaching mode, allows recruiting "blue chip" players and has a walk-on player creation system (which inexplicably allows you to customize the player's major between a few choices, but not to create a kicker or a punter — oh, come on).

It simulates games or entire seasons quickly and hassle-free. It has a plethora of bowl games included — some with details changed for obvious legal reasons, but it allows a team to march through a season and get into a bowl worthy of its performance, even if it's the Chick-fil-A Peach Bowl.

More legal oddness prevents inclusion of players' names, and as a result, no player in the game will ever be known as more than a number. Maybe a number who majored in history, but still a number. This is kind of sad, as other games will allow customizing players' names — but 989 chooses to focus its attention on game play.

The game play isn't as fluid and smooth as, say, EA's "NCAA Football 2001," but it's fun in and of itself. I love the camera angle for field goal attempts. Fumbles are fun to chase around. Tackling is somewhat awkward, but manageable. And I'm not sure why the "dive" button sometimes sends my player leaping at a 90-degree angle to my movement ("Aaaugh! It's the ball carrier! Don't hurt me!"). And whoever put the "stiff-arm" button so close to the "lateral right" button needs to be punished. It's certainly a different feel from "NCAA Football 2001" and takes some getting used to, but it's not abhorrent.

The color commentary, however, certainly is. While I like Keith Jackson, one of the best color men in college football, what this game needs is play-by-play, not color commentary laden with colorful cliches which begin repeating during the first game one plays. Jackson's commentary hurts me on a genetic level. Static would be preferable.

The game breaks that plane between "playing a game" and "in the game," when you actually feel like you're guiding a player instead of a bunch of pixels. It's still not the number one game in the rankings, but that doesn't mean it's not worth a shot. Play 'em both and give 'em a shot — there's no accounting for taste, and yours just might lead you into "GameBreaker's" end zone.

"Songs From An American Movie, Vol. Two: Good Time For A Bad Attitude."

By: Everclear

"Good Time For A Bad Attitude" is a hard-rocking, guitar-charged album — the exact opposite of the pop-oriented, mainstream '70s sound of "Learning How To Smile."

Tracks titled "Misery Whip" and "When It All Goes Wrong Again" are definite clues to the album's theme.

But don't confuse bad attitude with bad. The 12-track CD is far from it. It is a noisy and fun album. The lyrics, while dark and aggressive, are insightful.

"Good Time For A Bad Attitude" has an energy waiting to be released. So crank up the volume and prepare to rock.

Everclear has gone from one extreme to the other. The band's most recent compact disc, "Songs From An American Movie, Vol. Two: Good Time For A Bad Attitude," is its follow-up to "Songs From An American Movie, Vol. One: Learning How To Smile."

bands including Ultimate Fakebook, Ruskabank, Sharkey's Little Groove Box, Pomeroy and O'Phil.

The CD features a mix of old favorites, previously unreleased tracks and three bonus live tracks to finish the album off. It's almost 1 1/2 hours of hard-driving songs.

Three of the album's best tracks are Ultimate Fakebook's "Catch The Beat," Brothers From Different Mothers' remake of "Walkin' On Sunshine" and O'Phil's live performance of "Reno." Even though all of the tracks are worthy of their spots on "Radio Rage," these three stand out.

Although nothing is better than hearing these local bands live, "Radio Rage" is the perfect substitute. No other compilation contains this many bands all on one album.

NCAA basketball game disappointing, lacks realism

Review by KEN WELLS
Kansas State Collegian

The newest cutting-edge video games blur the line between reality and gaming.

When playing them, you feel like you're guiding real, live players with actual momentum and physics applying to their motion.

"NCAA Final Four 2001" isn't quite there yet — you never quite forget you're playing a game.

It's a diverting exercise, yet ultimately disappointing, to give the game a chance. The motion is choppy and muddled when compared to similar basketball games — it's always clear that 989 Sports is chasing the EA Sports banner, and it's not quite caught up yet.

It's not one huge factor, but a culmination of several minute touches, the collective feel of which falls short.

In addition, the game lacks what EA Sports calls "Dynasty Mode" — the ability to take a team and guide it through multiple seasons, graduating and recruiting players, tracking stats, etc. You get one season — no waiting patiently for our neighbors across the river to have an off season, as they always will have a very strong team. The lack of fluctuations in team strengths is both frustrating and depressing in its own way.

The commentary from ESPN's Quinn Buckner is stilted — it is saturated with artificial, mistimed enthusiasm and is best turned off and ignored.

This is not to say the game's a complete waste — there are a few small touches that bounce the ball in the game's favor. The team selection — more than 300 schools! — is ample. Never before in any video game have I heard the Cats take the floor to "Wabash Cannonball."

The shooting meter gives a more visual way of gauging your shots and a little more control over your accuracy, if not perfectly realized yet.

It's easy and quick to simulate an entire season, for which us no-patience types are grateful. And while other teams' strengths don't fluctuate as much as I'd like, the randomness during the season will ensure the same team doesn't always sweep the tournament (my third fully simulated season had the Cats win the Big 12 tourney, only to lose its first NCAA tourney game — and its only video game appearance in the 64-field team to date).

Overall, "NCAA Final Four 2001" isn't perfect, and it's not the best basketball game out there (might not even be the best college roundball, as I've yet to hunt down "NCAA March Madness 2001"), but it's diverting and fun against a friend. Just realize you won't be able to escape the feeling that it's only a game.

Court dims Gore's presidential aspirations

By RON FOURNIER
The Associated Press

Al Gore's prospects for winning the presidency dimmed Monday when a state judge refused to overturn George W. Bush's certified victory in Florida and the U.S. Supreme Court set aside a ruling that had allowed manual recounts. Running out of options, the vice president's team pleaded with Democrats to stick with him a few more days.

"They won. We lost. We're appealing," to the Florida Supreme Court, said Gore attorney David Boies as Gore advisers vowed the court would be his last stand. "We've moved one step closer to having this resolved."

It was, Gore's advisers said, a major step in the wrong direction.

Neither decision settled the legal knots tying up the election of a 43rd American president, but the developments were a blow for Gore. He is urgently searching for a court victory to sustain his presidential quest.

Circuit Judge N. Sanders Sauls rejected the Democrat's unprecedented contest of the election hours after the U.S. Supreme Court tossed the case back to the Florida Supreme Court, saying the state justices had to better explain why they extended a deadline for counting votes.

Andrew Card, Bush's prospective chief of staff, said the day's court rulings had buoyed the Republican camp and given new impetus to efforts to form a new Bush government.

"We'll be able to move pretty quickly," once there is either a conclusive court ruling or a Gore concession, Card said in an interview.

On day 27 of the longest, closest presidential race in a century, running mate Joseph Lieberman and campaign manager William Daley called Democrats on Capitol Hill to explain the whirlwind legal developments and urge them to remain steadfast.

Gore was dispatching Lieberman to rally Democratic lawmakers in person Tuesday, while GOP running mate Dick Cheney planned a Capitol Hill visit to talk to Republican congressmen about the presidential stalemate and Bush's transition plans.

One senior Democrat who participated in the talks said the Gore team showed no signs of quitting. However, the vice president's advisers said privately that their boss was running out of time and options.

They said he would not concede the race before the Florida Supreme Court rules on Sauls' decision and a Democratic lawsuit is settled in Seminole County over irregular handling of GOP absentee ballots. If he loses both cases, Gore is almost certain to give up, said advisers — most of Stampede headliners announced

By JAMIE BARRETT
Kansas State Collegian

Some old favorites as well as some new talent will be showcased at the sixth annual Country Stampede, June 21 through June 24 at Tuttle Creek State Park.

The lineup includes acts such as Neal McCoy, Sawyer Brown, Clay Walker, Tracy Lawrence, Travis Tritt, the Beach Boys, Charlie Daniels Band, Sara Evans, Keith Urban, Chad Brock, Shannon Smith and Dustin Evans. The lineup was announced Monday.

Paige Roesler, Country Stampede festival manager, said the lineup was decided through surveys given to previous concertgoers and monitoring current talent.

"We try to get the top-10 people that the survey produces, and we also try to see who is hot at the time," Roesler said.

Roesler said Neal McCoy and Sawyer Brown have been featured at the festival before, but there are plenty of new entertainers to the festival.

"We wanted to have Neal McCoy and Sawyer Brown back because they are high energy shows," Roesler said.

Lisa Cruzeiro, sophomore in kinesiology, said she has attended the concert in the past but is not as interested in it this year because of repeating acts.

"It does not seem like it they have a lot of different people from last year," Cruzeiro said. "I am kind of impartial to the acts they are having this year."

Roesler said there also will be some non-country talent featured at the show, including the Beach Boys.

"38 Special is the rock group that is being featured this year," Roesler said. "We always have some great non-country acts."

Alisha Attaway, sophomore in nursing, said she has attended the concert before and is excited about the lineup for this year.

"What I like about Country Stampede is that there are so many people from all walks of life who all have an interest in the same type of music," Attaway said. "The main acts are always so energetic, and the artists really seem as though they are really happy to be there."

Prices for the tickets and campsites will be the same as last year and will go on sale at 9 a.m. Saturday. Roesler said no walk-in or online orders will be accepted Saturday.

"We are only going to accept phone orders on Dec. 9," Roesler said. "It is only fair for all the people that place orders on that day."

Three-day general admission tickets will be on sale for $60, one-day general admission tickets will be on sale for $30 and VIP tickets will be on sale for $325. Campsite prices vary from $150 to $400.

Attaway said the ticket prices are comparable to other concert ticket prices.

"I think for all the acts you get to see at the Stampede, the ticket prices are very comparable to all the other major country acts," Attaway said. "I really think it is worth the money if you like the artists."

Work at KSU Child Development Center helps teachers, students

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Tara Mossa held up a small wooden W for a 3-year-old girl in her preschool class.

"Where does this one go?" she asked.

She gave gentle encouragement to the child as she searched for the magic slot. Mossa praised her as the tiny hand slid the letter into place. The child knows her alphabet and has the skills of a 5-year-old, she said.

"I can't see myself in a suit sitting behind a desk," Mossa said. "I get to get on the floor with them and be goofy, and I dance with them."

She couldn't do her job if she didn't love children. As a teacher at the KSU Child Development Center, she is paid little, but the emotional demands can be great. When Mossa started at the center 11 years ago, she was deeply troubled to learn one of the children with whom she worked had been molested by a relative — a harsh reality for anyone who works with children. Eight of every 1,000 children in Riley County are abused each year, according to Kansas Children's Report Card.

She said it caused her to have trouble sleeping at first, but she couldn't stay away.

"I knew the kids needed my love and affection," she said. "They needed 50 hugs a day."

Mossa has a bachelor's degree in biology, but has decided to work toward her master's degree in early childhood education at K-State. This was a significant financial decision for her family, she said.

Money is tight and her husband works two jobs, she said. Had she decided to pursue an advanced degree in biology, she would have been able to earn much more money.

"We live on my salary but not in luxury," she said. "If I don't work 40 hours a week, it affects the way we live that month."

Workers with four-year degrees start at $7 an hour at the center. The national average wage for child care workers in 1998 was $6.61, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics latest data.

The custodians who work on campus make more than the teachers at the center, Angela Allison, center director, said. The center provides benefits to its employees, but many centers do not.

Allison said she didn't know how wages could be increased for child care workers. Increasing wages would mean increasing child care costs, which most parents could not afford, she said.

The center and others in the community care for children of varying ages, but it is the non-school-aged children who often spend the most time in child care. The low wages and poor benefits can make it difficult to attract qualified caregivers and teachers to the profession.

The early childhood education major at K-State has only 156 undergraduate students and 24 master's students split between early childhood education and early childhood special education.

Carrie Ficke, graduate student in early childhood special education, said working with children makes her happy so she doesn't worry about money, but she wished parents had a better understanding of the role of the child care provider.

"Some think we are glorified babysitters," she said.

Children do a lot of developing in their first five years, and early childhood students are trained to recognize the developmental stages of children and work to enhance that development.

They take courses dealing with the verbal, emotional, cognitive, social and physical development of children. Undergraduate students then have to apply their knowledge in lab settings and student teach before they graduate.

Graduate students also work directly with children in practicums on and off campus.

Not all child-care centers have teachers with degrees and significant training in caring for children

Kansas rates B- in child care overall

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

While many students are cramming for finals and anxiously awaiting final grades, Kansas already has received a grade on the welfare of its children.

The Kansas Action for Children Inc. issued its report on the status of children in Kansas, giving the state an overall grade of a B-.

The overall grade is an average of five categories.

"We hope that the report card will be a tool that people around the state can use," executive director Gary Brunk said.

Kansas received a B in the safety and security category. Violent crime, child abuse and neglect, and childhood poverty all were evaluated to determine the final grade. According to the report card, in 1998, 10,972 violent crimes were committed in Kansas, which is a rate of 420 crimes per 100,000 citizens. KAC has set its goal for 2000 to decrease that number

K-State photographers honored in competition

Two Collegian photographers were recognized in the photojournalism competition of the Hearst Journalism Awards Program.

Kelly Glasscock, sophomore in print journalism, received sixth place in the competition along with a $500 award.

Mike Shepherd, senior in print journalism, placed 18th in the competition. Shepherd will resume shooting for the Collegian in the spring after a semesterlong internship at the Muskegon Chronicle in Michigan.

The annual photo competition pulls entries from more than 100 member colleges and universities across the country. Contestants submit a collection of four photos for judging by professional photographers from The Los Angeles Times, The Philadelphia Inquirer and The Associated Press.

K-State sends entries from two photographers after a local judging by professionals from area newspapers and K-State Photo Services.

Cliff Palmberg, senior in print journalism and a two-time Hearst winner, said he is confident that K-State photographers will continue to see awards from the Hearst competition.

"K-State has a great tradition of photojournalism, and the next generation of Hearst applicants has exciting work," Palmberg said.

Union workers question safety at nitrogen plant

LAWRENCE — Union workers at a Farmland Industries nitrogen plant are questioning management's commitment to safety, alleging that neglect to aging and dirty equipment is putting workers and nearby residents at risk.

An explosion at the plant on July 14 can be traced to management policies, union members claim, noting that they were the ones who asked safety officials to intervene.

"If Farmland would've been a good citizen and a good employer, OSHA never would've been brought in," said Fred Thorne, president of Paper, Allied Industrial, Chemical & Energy Workers Local 5-0613.

Citations were issued by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration against Farmland. OSHA proposed $7,650 in fines, though Farmland has until Dec. 12 to contest the penalties.

Plant manager Dick Lind said OSHA's report shows that safety problems at the plant weren't serious.

"We feel we operate a safe plant, (and) we feel we have the people to run a safe plant for themselves and the community," he said.

Thorne maintains that adequate safety measures could have prevented the explosion, tracing the blast to an incident July 7 when pressure built up in a compressor and blew a gasket. Windows were rattled in nearby residences and a fire burned itself out after two hours.

A decision was made July 13 to reopen the plant, but Thorne and Lind disagree about whether Farmland officials understood the cause of the blast.

Employees noticed that vibrations were beginning again during a restart attempt and the system was shut down, narrowly avoiding an accident, Thorne said.

"If they'd had an ignition source, it would've started up then," he said.

An ignition source was present the next day, causing a bigger blast and shutting down the plant.

"I think they should've had a thorough investigation the first time, and we wouldn't have had a second and third incident," Thorne said.

Lind said he was comfortable with the restart decisions "based upon the information that we had."

OSHA cited Farmland for not investigating each incident which resulted in, or could reasonably have resulted in, a catastrophic release of a highly hazardous chemical in the workplace.

Union officials say the safety problem can be blamed on high turnover, cuts in maintenance staff and Farmland's general attitude toward legitimate safety concerns.

Former prime minister might seek office again

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Monday that he is close to deciding whether to challenge Ehud Barak for the premiership, saying the first priority must be to restore security after two months of Israeli-Palestinian violence.

Netanyahu has a double-digit lead in opinion polls over Barak. The current Palestinian uprising has left many Israelis disillusioned with the prime minister and his handling of the peace process, and Barak has been forced to call early elections.

Netanyahu refused to give a clear answer when asked whether he would run for prime minister. He said he "would consult first of all with my family, and my associates and myself" and would make a decision soon — not in weeks or in months.

Because of the violence, Netanyahu said the nation is gripped by fear. The most important goal now, he said, is to return a feeling of security to every citizen.

During his 1996-99 tenure, Netanyahu struck a tough security stance and was perceived by Palestinians and the United States as stalling peace negotiations. Barak handily defeated him in elections and took office 18 months ago.

Meanwhile, the political turmoil and the ongoing violence appeared to feed off one another

Monday as the region endured another tense day. Nearly 300 people have been killed since late September.

Israeli troops and Palestinian gunmen waged fierce shootouts near a Jewish shrine in Bethlehem, a West Bank town controlled by the Palestinians. In the Gaza Strip, an explosion killed an Islamic militant who apparently was preparing to plant a bomb.

The Israeli army said Palestinian gunmen attacked the shrine, revered by Jews as Rachel's Tomb, the burial site of the biblical matriarch, from three sides and apparently tried to take it over. Palestinians said the fighting broke out after soldiers and Jewish settlers attacked Muslims.

Panel educates students on life with HIV, AIDS

By NANCY HULL

Kansas State Collegian

Eunice Dorst said she wants people to realize that AIDS affects real people with real lives.

Dorst, director of the Regional AIDS Project, spoke Monday night at an AIDS panel discussion in Moore Hall about an AIDS patient who died six months ago.

This patient did not have the support of his family, Dorst said. None of the family members would speak at the funeral, she said.

"Their negativity pulled him down so much that it would have been better if they didn't say anything at all," she said.

The patient died after he quit taking medication.

"The shakes and side effects made his life so miserable that he preferred a shorter life with quality rather than year after year of suffering," Dorst said.

Dorst was part of the three-person panel discussion that gave students the opportunity to learn more about AIDS. This is the third year for the AIDS awareness week project.

Panelist Harold Conner said the medications he takes are so toxic that his liver and kidneys are being destroyed.

Conner tested HIV positive in 1990 and has had full-blown AIDS since 1991.

"The doctors say I'm in the end stages," Conner said. "Right now, they're trying any drug to keep me alive."

He said he takes a total of 35 pills each day.

Support from people around him has kept him going, he said. The fact his mother has already buried one child is the hardest thing to deal with, Conner said.

"My stepdad told me that my mother's biggest fear is that one day she'll wake up for my morning medication to find me dead," he said.

When he cries out to his mother at night, she sits by his bed and massages his legs until the pain is dull enough that he can sleep.

The deterioration of nerves and muscles causes Conner's legs to give out sometimes when he's walking. He wakes up at night with fevers to a soaking bed, and he suffers from clinical depression. Glaucoma has left him with 10 percent of his vision and no peripheral vision.

Conner said to avoid negativity toward the disease, people need to realize it's not just a gay disease.

"Blacks, whites, males, females, gay, straight, adults, children — anyone can have this," he said.

Dorst said the United States is the only country in the world that refers to AIDS as the "gay disease."

"People here in Manhattan are in denial. They don't want to hear about it," she said.

When Conner received news that he was HIV positive, the doctor's office told him he was no longer a patient and hung up the phone.

"In Manhattan at that time, there was nowhere to go. I didn't know who to go to," he said.

Stacie Morrison, AIDS Awareness Week co-chairwoman and junior in business management, said she's glad the panel could raise awareness about a subject people don't like to talk about.

"I want students to realize this is in Kansas, and this does affect people our own age," Morrison said.

CANDY HOUSES

Bakery Science Club members create goods for holiday season

By LYNNE HERMANSEN

Kansas State Collegian

The smells and sights of homemade Christmas goodies soon can delight students and faculty.

The Bakery Science Club will sponsor its annual Christmas Bake Sale from 3 to 5 p.m. Wednesday on the first-floor hallway of Shellenberger Hall.

"The popular specialized items are really big," Melanie Haines, junior in bakery science, said.

Haines said these items are huge sellers because of people's hectic schedules and their lack of time to prepare such treats.

"Some people don't like to bake during the holiday season," she said. "This makes their job easier. They can just pull the item or items out of the freezer and cook them."

Marvin Willyard, professor of bakery science, said the Bakery Science Club has been preparing for Wednesday's sale.

"They have been baking for several days to support this bake sale," Willyard said.

Haines said all the items are usually sold.

"The items have to be ordered, and we have room for extra this year, because of the high demand from previous years," she said.

Items for sale include gingerbread houses, fruitcakes, gingerbread families and trees and cookies.

Gingerbread houses sell for $15, fruitcakes for $7.50, families and trees for $5 and cookies range from $2.50 to $3.50.

"The price range in cookies is because of the varied specialized more expensive ingredients used in the items," Haines said.

"Candies for fruitcakes are expensive, and M&Ms cost more than chocolate chips."

Gingerbread house kits are this year's new item, selling for $7.50.

"The kits contain the gingerbread slabs," Haines said. "People put together the pieces with the supplied icing and decorations. I think it will be a big hit and an enjoyable experience for people to decorate their own houses."

Haines said she expects a good turnout.

"Since this is a special bake sale, I expect us to do well," she said. "Most people like Christmas treats."

Child care in Kansas needs improvement in lackluster areas

This is a report card you would want parents to see.

A report issued by the Kansas Action for Children Inc. grades the overall status of children in Kansas between the ages of 0 to 19 as a B-. This basically is saying that Kansas is doing a decent job, but there is plenty of room for improvement.

One of the categories is child care. Kansas should be ashamed of its grade: a C-. This was brought forth in relation to observing the quality, the cost to parents in terms of affordability and capacity, as well as resource and referrals.

The average state wages were low as well, only $9 for directors and $7 for teacher/directors. The latter received a $.50 drop from 1999.

This can be found in terms of Tara Mossa, a teacher at the KSU Child Development Center. Mossa gave up a career as a biologist and turned down a larger sum of money in order to assist children.

In terms of affordability, the percent of median household income that was devoted to child care was a little more than one tenth for infants, exactly 10 percent for toddlers and 8.3 percent for school-aged children.

The capacity for child care is shrinking. Only 130,332 slots existed in Kansas, down from 132,923 in 1998/1999.

For resources and referrals KACCRR reports their member agencies handled 20,160 calls in regards to wanting information on child care.

K-State should continue to support the child care programs, and encourage them to increase the funding in departments that relate to future generations, such as this. Kansas should not settle for a B-, especially if they earned a C- in child care.

Writer reflects on semester of immaturity

It's over? Well, I failed; the Collegian groupies have yet to come knocking on the door, my discussions of dating have yielded me no further insight into females and I never got a chance to dazzle with my religion columns. So what now?

I am not going to end my writings in a flurry of encouraging remarks to my dedicated readers (all two of you). Nor do I plan on sending angry retorts to those whom so eloquently disagreed with me on Napster and despised me for mentioning "greek" in a column. Last, I don't plan to finish this thing with a canned quote like "What a long, strange trip it's been."

I would call my semester of writings a test, a psychology study without the Freudian references or cute women with whom to have "study groups." I set out to evoke a response in people that I found lacking in previous semester's columns — laughter. Moreover, I tried to entertain in a manner just above lowbrow humor, dropping the journalistic bar to the point of childish drivel, then raising it slightly. Finally, I wanted to do these things and still move people to more than what a "roommates need to communicate" column could do.

Inspiration and discord normally are targeted emotions for writing. Writing middle-of-the-road material seems utterly futile in the fast-paced setting of college. We lack the time for "pointless" stories; a worthwhile column either should make us want to plant a tree, hug a whale and join the Peace Corps or, conversely, write a nasty e-mail and rally 'round our families with a pocketful of shells. Who wants relationship humor in such an environment?

I did, and I thought others might, too. The reality that, within a matter of three years, I should be entirely out on my own, possibly married, and working a 9 to 5 with no spring break or even the extensive winter break doesn't just make me slightly uneasy — it scares the hell out of me.

My columns afforded me a chance to slow down for a moment. Out of the college whirlwind was taken a weekly snapshot of my life, recorded for the pleasure (or lack thereof) of my readership. During a semester of filling for internships and scholarships, three-test weeks and a relationship gone bad I decided that the most important issues in my life — those worth writing on — were the dating set-up, Campus Fourum calls and a woman named "Booger."

It might sound like I have my priorities out of whack. I probably do. I have noticed, though, that with half my college life spent and the other half dwindling away, I don't remember the tests or scholarship applications. I remember a couple set-ups gone awry, some funny Fourums and any number of other seemingly forgettable aspects of life. Those who forget such minutia already have missed the best part of college; they already have grown up.

CLINT MUDRICK

VINCE JACOBSON / Collegian

I am not a full-fledged adult with all the answers, and I conceded that fact every time dictated it in my columns. Maturity — sorry, Mom — is not something I am striving for yet. Thus, I see abortion discussions to be secondary to Napster arguments; in neither case can you change another's mind, but at least the latter can be discussed over Gumby's and a beer. Some might say I am hiding from the realities of life by avoiding such big issues, and, well, they are right.

A college career spent worrying only about the world's ills and résumé-building is empty. It has more tangible attributes than one with a less structured foundation, but it lacks depth and experience. Before college, one is too young and dependent to get the most from life. After college one tends to get too tied up in work and family to have time to experience life in its entirety. To spend college reading columns looking to get offended, meeting people looking to judge them as trendy and entering situations looking to have no fun is lunacy.

Thus, the challenge to my readers. Read an abortion column for content without checking the writer's gender. Meet a frat guy and not label him as trendy until he breaks out the "Beavers" hat; conversely, meet a residence hall student and not assume he or she is just waiting to get back to Quake 3.

Most importantly, laugh at the pickup lines we males give, find the humor (though don't be honest) in females' "Is she prettier than me?" questions. Last, if you see a guy doing the sprinkler in Safari Jack's Watering Hole wearing brown shoes, a black belt, green pants and a button-down shirt with purple stars, be nice to him; it's probably me.

Oops, I wrote a motivational column; I apologize. To those amazed that I matured and wrote about something of substance, please realize that a Simpson's column was slated until I realized this would be my last column. But, to get to a point, I will not quote "Seinfeld" but Ferris Bueller, who declared, "Life moves pretty fast. If you don't stop and look around once in a while, you could miss it." Oh yeah, and to those groupies — I'm still waiting.

Career punt return yards needed for record: 57. Career punt returns for touchdowns needed for record: 1. Getting screwed out of the opportunity to break two long-standing records by Bill Snyder your senior season: priceless.

I wish the chem department would try to plan their study sessions a little bit better so that way they wouldn't try to put all of the chem students in Willard 114 for a chem review, because not all of them will fit in there, and it's kind of a problem.

Good job, guys. Congratulations to the football team. We're bowlbound. Nothing to be ashamed of; you did a great job.

If David Allen had an older brother, would that better his chance of getting the national record?

Towel Guy, I was just wondering — are you that enthusiastic in everything you do?

I just realized something. Americans cannot decide on anything. We have lawyers deciding our president and a computer deciding who is going to play for a national title. Get a life.

Did anyone else notice that Boomer Sooner doesn't rhyme?

Congratulations, Wildcats. You played one hell of a game Saturday. We are proud of you. Now let's finish the season with a win in Dallas.

Just a note: this year we got our tree legally.

I know this probably wouldn't get printed, but I just wanted the Kansas State fans to know that a couple of our top players are under investigation by the Big 12 for throwing the game against Oklahoma.

To the Cooper basher — why don't you be the volunteer?

Hey, non-athletes — I am a student athlete, and I would love the benefits you keep talking about.

America's weak stance on Iraq strengthens Husseins

When in the course of college semesters, it becomes absolutely imperative for one columnist to desire to explain complicated issues to readers so that they might understand and draw intuitive thought, and to assume among the powers of universal news source, the separator of truth and factual claims that both by the Laws of Nature and other acts of God entitles him, an educated student body should require that he should serve them delightful insight each day.

However, I hold these truths to be self-evident, that all readers are NOT created equal. That some are well-endowed by their creator with a higher level of understanding hinders my pursuit of their life, liberty and good humor.

Moreover, the readership of the Collegian is composed of the most diverse group imaginable. Serving the interests of even the majority is a large obstacle.

Put in plain English, it's hard to connect with readers. No matter the level of journalistic experience or scholastic ability one might have, it takes a certain skill just to receive creative response.

But a columnist must always press onward toward the unattainable goal. Known as the speed of light in the journalistic world, the goal is writing an insightful piece that the common Joe can understand.

One that the reader can relate and find some point while reading. "I've thought that before." A column that might cause the readers to opt for change in their world.

Today's topic is American Foreign Policy in Iraq. Now freeze. You might not think this topic would be your idea of a "perfect" column.

You might not even know where Iraq is. Sad, but true. However, I've done close to 100 hours of research on the topic, so bear with me.

The information I have working knowledge of would make me sound like a U. S. Department of State spokesperson. Most of you would lay the column down when you read the first line.

But I realize I need to use common terms. I want to connect with you. It all goes back to you finding a way to associate with me. What I need you to do now is think of a small town in Kansas.

America is like a bossy, nosy, overdependent neighbor in Smalltown, Kansas, USA. A few blocks over, on the other side of the tracks, lies a neighborhood in a state of unrest.

The Hussein family abode happens to be adjacent to the tiny Kuwaiti family casa. Other immediate neighbors include the Kurdite family to the north and the Shi'ite family to the south.

The Hussein family possesses at least one huge mastiff dog with the mentality of a rottweiler and the intentions of a pit bull. In short, this dog is aggressive. Mr. Saddam, daddy of the Hussein family, likes to let his dog run rampant on the block and terrorize the Kuwaiti, Kurdite, and Shi'ite family.

In fact, Saddam's brain, deteriorating with cancer, would like nothing better than for his dog to run the other families clear off of the block.

But America has assumed the role of animal control police in Smalltown. And lately the American dogcatcher has become frustrated with Saddam's loose dog inflicting so much pain on his immediate neighbors. They are tired of it.

America would like nothing better than to bulldoze the Hussein household and leave nothing but a pile of dust. However, Saddam controls a vital commodity in the town: woven baskets. The Hussein household has a large backyard of reeds from which they can weave baskets.

Across town, the American industry needs some baskets. They have depleted their own backyard supply of reeds, and instead of finding alternative forms of containers such as plastic baskets, the Americans have become overly reliant on reeds from the block which Hussein dominates.

First, the town put a wicker-for-food program, which restricts the Husseins from buying any more dogs.

However, Saddam's family is suffering, as he eats all the food or trades it away to some neighbors for doggie treats. Second, Smalltown ordinance has let Americans set up what they like to call a "No-Doggie" zone on Saddam's block. When his mastiff wanders into the neighbors lawn, the Americans are ready.

They sit armed with a .243 rifle with a dandy scope. When the mastiff wanders, they shoot at it from across the way. Bombs away!

It works most of the time, as the confused dog has no way to really fight back. The neighbors are protected.

But Americans aren't really solving any problems with their policies. They will never commit to enter Saddam's house and see how many mastiffs he might be hiding inside.

They are content to sit back, stick to the guns, hope the wicker-for-food program will work and wait.

The Americans' indecisiveness has given Saddam power.

As his people suffer, he only laughs as his dog becomes less gun shy and ready to attack.

Columnist misinforms readers on Lafene, proper use of antibiotics

Editor,

Erin Schneewis, you should be knowledgeable of your subject before you print such a misinformed view of the professional team of doctors and other medical staff that comprise Lafene Health Center.

First, Lafene is fully accredited by the Joint Commission on Accreditation of Healthcare Organizations. This type of accreditation is not something that must be earned by the facility. Your column titled "Student activism will lead Lafene to make changes" is misinformative as well as derogatory.

I assume you were hoping the physician would prescribe you an antibiotic for your unfortunate illness. The symptoms you describe in your column spurred you into action and left you disgruntled about the care you received from Lafene. Your symptoms sound much like a cold, for which antibiotics do nothing. This misuse of the antibiotics you so much wished to receive is part of a growing problem with microbes' current resistance to medications growing even stronger, this threatening patients and our surroundings. Viral infections are not susceptible to antibiotics, which fight bacteria.

As our culture becomes more addictive to a quick-fix, this pressures doctors to over-prescribe antibiotics. This is the time of year the health-care systems are deluged with patients coming in with respiratory infections. It is not uncommon that the symptoms of a cold might linger with a person for five days, but this is not a problem. It is the responsibility of the university doctors not to abuse the antibiotic cabinet.

As for you having paid your student fees to enjoy the use of the university health center, that much is true. However, this fee is nominal in comparison to the fees you would be faced with your only access was non-campus physicians. It is my belief that the Lafene Health Center is drastically underfunded by students, and I would support higher student fees for use by Lafene. But, though there is lack of funding to Lafene, you can rest assured that you are still receiving the optimum in health care.

I also found your comment, "Had it been this week, I would have went with the Fourum's suggestion of going to the Vet Med Center instead" to be anything but comical. Our College of Veterinary Medicine enjoys the reputation of being one of the finest veterinary medical teaching facilities in the United States.

I commend the Lafene staff for not putting blinders on in regards to antibiotic resistance. The action you took in writing your column only will serve to misinform the student body about a growing problem — antibiotic resistance.

Brownback speaks at Union

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

Midwest farmers can be a powerful force in cleaning up environmental damage or victims of governmental regulation, Sen. Sam Brownback, R-Kan., told an audience at the K-State Student Union on Monday afternoon.

"Exploring Carbon Sequestration in Agriculture: Challenges and Opportunities," a four-hour conference conducted at K-State, was devoted to exploring how Midwestern agriculture could help reduce dramatic increases in atmospheric carbon dioxide.

"I think it's important that agriculture get involved in this discussion now," said Brownback, the opening speaker for the conference.

While international agreements such as the Kyoto Protocol have garnered global attention of rising levels of greenhouse gases like carbon dioxide and the carbon-based methane, a division has begun to form between solutions.

Some critics want reductions only in the primary causes: internal combustion engines, widespread agriculture and forest clearing. Others have proposed carbon sequestration, or methods to recollect and store excess carbon.

By using plants to take up atmospheric carbon to support their own growth and using low- to no-tillage farming methods, soil carbon sequestration is theorized to keep carbon tied up in soil sinks for many years.

As a result, agricultural powers have a potential stake in the carbon storage business. Staying on the sidelines, Brownback said, means farmers not only will be left behind but caught in governmental regulation.

Brownback has sponsored a domestic bill he said will reimburse farmers for sequestration. Overall, Brownback said he would rather see farmers use the open market, including negotiation with companies, as a vehicle for carbon storage than be regulated.

John Kimble, research soil scientist with the Natural Resources Conservation Service, said sequestration either way is intended to buy time. The process is estimated to sustain carbon for 30 to 75 years while scientists search for a more permanent solution.

"It's not the answer," he said. "It's part of the package deal."

On the other hand, Kimble said strategies that reduce carbon loss in soils like reduced tillage, irrigation management, and precision farming also will reduce erosion and preserve water quality.

"We should be doing this anyway," he said. Charles Rice, professor of agronomy and one of the organizers of the conference, said the Midwest's high-carbon soils have been mined over the generations.

"I guess on the positive side, this means these soils have the high potential to store carbon," he said.

On the average, Rice said the soils could keep collecting carbon for about 50 years.

Rice and his colleagues are examining how much and how fast the soil can take up carbon. With funding recently secured by Sen. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., K-State is part of the nine-university Consortium of Agricultural Soil Mitigation of Greenhouse Gases. The group, he said, is expected to determine exact rates of carbon sequestration and economic policy strategies, providing the information the producers, the public and policy makers.

Jeff Williams, professor of agricultural economics, said carbon storage also could give farmers carbon credits that could be sold under a buyer's market to businesses to make up for their own emissions.

"It creates an efficiency that might not exist in a purely regulatory environment," he said.

Even if the U.S. remains unsigned on the Kyoto Protocol, Williams said the system could benefit producers nationally.

"I don't think agriculture will be shut out even if we don't have these international markets," he said.

Internationally, carbon sequestration is still a hard sell. Sara Hensenflow, legislative assistant to Brownback, said the European Union and environmental groups did not want to allow the U.S. to count its carbon sequestration as a reduction under the provisions of the Kyoto Protocol.

Recent negotiations broke down, she said, when the U.S. wanted to include 300 million metric tons it sequestered as a whole, about 25 million metric tons of it in agriculture.

"I think sinks will play a very important part of making a treaty the U.S. senate will agree to," she said.

early childhood education.

Melissa Boutz, senior in early childhood education, worked as an assistant teacher in a child-care center during her first year at K-State.

None of the teachers at the center had degrees in early childhood education.

Being thrown into a classroom of small children was scary at first, she said.

She didn't know exactly how to treat them so she talked to them all like they were little adults, she said.

As she starting taking classes, she learned more about how children develop and learn.

"I get so much out of my classes. It is all essential to what they are doing," she said.

She said she was amazed how much information the children absorb as if they were sponges.

What they are learning now will set the stage for their future lives, she said.

Ficke said she didn't think people understood how much environment affected children's development.

At Hoefflin Stone House Child Care Center where she works, as at the KSU Child Development Center, children learn through play.

Children enhance their motor skills by playing with blocks or improve their language skills through singing.

Amy Hunsucker, senior in early childhood education, was preparing group time for toddlers at Stone House.

The students put on puppet shows or do flannel board presentations along with the singing.

Doing the presentations or getting the children to move with the songs keeps them more engaged and gives the children who can't or don't want to sing something to do, she said.

Hunsucker was setting out little frog cutouts for when the children were going to sing "Five Green Speckled Frogs Sitting on a Log."

She said the children like repetition. Sometimes they want to sing the same song over and over.

It can be frustrating, but she said she loved the children.

"They are so fun," she said. "Their learning is so active. They like to get involved in things."

Mossa said her experiences in classes have helped her gain more confidence in her job.

She has implemented in her classroom and shared with parents concepts about discipline she has learned.

She is learning more about working with disabled children and although she had some understanding of human development through her biology studies, she is building a much more expansive knowledge of child development.

Mossa said she still takes her work home with her, but now the children have a happy place in her dreams.

She blew kisses to all the children and called their names as she went to leave for the day.

"I am not sure I could survive unless I really love my job," she said.

Cats give Illini battle before falling 76-56

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

A confused crowd departed Bramlage Coliseum on Saturday afternoon.

Soon after No. 9 Illinois (5-2) took care of K-State (2-2) 76-56, fans walked to their cars scratching their heads wondering what had just happened.

Weren't the Fighting Illini, coming off of two close games against top-ranked teams, predicted to walk all over the Wildcats in their tune-up for Arizona on Dec. 16?

K-State head coach Jim

Wooldridge had a different plan, however, and managed to convince Wildcat basketball fans everywhere that this isn't the same mediocre team that has festered in the Big 12 cellar since the league's inception.

"They played as hard as they could for 40 minutes," Wooldridge said. "I felt that we played real hard. Our kids were trying to get down to the home stretch with a chance to win, and I think that's a credit to our players."

Although K-State lost to the better-sized, better-skilled Fighting Illini, guard Phineas Atchison also was proud of the Cats' effort.

"We played real well. We came out with a lot of intensity," Atchison said. "We stayed in the game the first half because everybody put forth a lot of effort. We just have to take this and build off it."

Illinois began the game as expected, taking advantage of K-State's 3-for-13 start from the field to jump out to a 24-8 lead.

All the signs of another big K-State loss were present until Travis Reynolds' short jumper with 11:22 to go in the half calmed the Cats down.

That bucket started an 8-0 run that cut the lead in half, including an alley-oop from Atchison to Reynolds that brought the majority of the 6,415 in attendance to their feet for the first time in the game.

However, the Cats would suffer from 11 first-half turnovers, a number that would grow to 19 by the final buzzer.

"Turnovers were a big problem," Wooldridge said. "We presented Illinois a lot of opportunities without our defense in front of the ball."

"Obviously, when you're playing a team of Illinois' caliber you have to do a lot of things very well, one of which is to take care of the ball."

Despite shooting 37 percent from the floor in the first half, including a 2-for-7 display from beyond the 3-point arc, K-State trailed the Illini by 11 points at the end of the first half.

"We got open looks — it just wouldn't fall for us," Atchison said after the game.

Shooting remained a problem for K-State in the second half as well, as the Cats finished just 34 percent from the field and could muster only 25 team points.

"We missed a lot of shots," Reynolds said. "Guys were missing shots they usually make — that hurt us. Once we got down by 10, we needed to hit those shots, and we didn't."

Although Illinois kept K-State in the game by shooting just 50 percent from the charity stripe, the Cats had trouble holding onto the ball all day, and Illinois finished with 31 points off of Wildcat turnovers.

K-State was still able to keep it close in the early part of the second half, narrowing the margin to single digits three times, but Illinois' first half lead was too much for the Cats to overcome, and the Cats trailed by more than 10 for the game's final 8:50.

Wooldridge said his team's performance in its first game against a top-10 opponent showed the Wildcats' potential to go beyond expectations this season.

"When you play Illinois and you have successful possessions it means you're working together, and hopefully it will be a positive learning experience," he said. "I believe there are some things that we can take out of this game to help us be a better team tomorrow."

Women's squad grabs 3rd straight Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

K-State won its third consecutive Commerce Bank Wildcat Classic title Saturday at Bramlage Coliseum with its 63-54 victory over Texas A&M-Corpus Christi.

Senior guard Kim Woodlee paced the Cats (5-1) throughout the tournament, following up her 19 point performance Friday night with a career-best 28 points against the Islanders. This eclipsed her 26 point night two years ago against Eastern Michigan.

After Texas A&M-Corpus Christi beat Tennessee State on Friday night to kick off the tournament, K-State took the floor in its first action of the weekend against Texas Southern.

K-State began the night with a sizzling 71-percent shooting performance from the field in the first half, and went into halftime up 28 points. Fourteen of Woodlee's 19 points would come in a first half, which saw just six Wildcat shots miss their mark.

"I think we were moving the ball very well," Woodlee's backcourt mate Kristin Rethman said. "We were getting good looks, and our post players were getting their shots."

The Cats continued their marksmanship from the field in the second half, setting the tournament record with their 59.6-percent mark. Woodlee said that kind of performance was a product of great passes, ball movement, unselfish play and converting on open shots.

Meanwhile, Friday's game marked freshman Nicole Ohlde's first start for the Wildcats after duty as the Cats' sixth man.

"I really think I came out slow and wasn't as aggressive as I needed to be," Ohlde said of her first-half play. "After a while, I think I came back, but I still didn't play as aggressive as I needed to play."

After playing a big role in the Cats' appearance in last weekend's Beaver Classic, the freshman contributed with nine points and seven rebounds in the win over Texas Southern.

Senior guard Morgan Finneran also saw her first action of the year with the Cats on Friday night. Finneran, who missed K-State's first five games with a foot injury, finished with two points, two assists and three rebounds in 16 minutes.

"We were glad to have her back out on the floor," Rethman said. "That's just that much more experience out there and Morgan definitely knows what's going on."

Friday night's win meant a match-up with a Texas A&M-Corpus Christi, a team that had little trouble getting past Tennessee State the night before.

However, against the Wildcats, the Islanders had trouble finding the bucket in the first half, shooting just 16 percent in connecting on just 4-of-25 shots from the field.

Corpus Christi's 11 first-half points set a tournament record for the fewest points scored by a single team in a half.

K-State kept the Islanders scoreless for the first 6:15 of the game and managed to build a strong 18 point lead by halftime.

That lead wouldn't last, though, as the Islanders pulled together and stormed back in the second frame behind nearly 59 percent shooting from the floor.

With just 1:23 to go in the game, the Cat lead was trimmed to four, but Woodlee's sixth three-pointer of the game on the ensuing trip sealed the deal for K-State's seventh consecutive trip to the Classic's Championship game.

Christmas list should not include request for Santa to change BCS

Ah, the sights and smells of Christmas/New Year's/football/bowl week are once again as noticeable as Bobby Bowden's Southern twang.

Every year it never fails. College football coaches work to make sure they're not naughty (lose like Baylor) so they can sit on the fake Santa Claus at the nearest mall (bowl committees) and tell them what they want for Christmas (anything but the Insight.com Bowl) so they don't end up waiting on Christmas (practice field) for coal in their stocking (Gallery Furniture.com Bowl).

Instead, they write letters (try to win more games than they lose, unlike ... well ... Baylor) to the real Santa Claus (a bunch of computer geniuses who make up the BCS rankings) in order to get the cool compact disc player (national championship game).

Unfortunately, only a few get what they want (Florida State and Oklahoma) while everyone else ends up with the decade-old furry pink sweater from Grandma (pretty much any bowl that has a .com in it or starts with "A" and ends with "lambo").

This disparity (I'm not sure what to put in this one. I just got so used to doing this parentheses thing ... sorry) happens every year. And in the past three years, everyone blames their crappy "presents" on the Bowl Championship Series ranking.

This year might be the biggest chance for BCS doubters to come out of the woodwork and complain. Three teams with great records and a strong season were dissed for the ultimate present. Washington (10-1), Oregon State (10-1) and the big one Miami (10-1) all have legitimate reasons to bitch.

Now everyone's calling for a playoff and discarding the unfair BCS system. But, just for the sake of argument, I will have to disagree. Sure, the BCS has problems, but let's not be quick to change a basically young system just because it didn't work one year. Let me explain.

Any system, whether it be the BCS, the ancient bowl system or a playoff system, has problems. Not everything's perfect. Someone is always going to be left out.

Say we had an eight-team playoff format. The ninth team is always going to complain about how they got shafted.

Everyone knows that not everyone gets what they want, especially at Christmas time. I can't guess how many times I got clothes when all I wanted was a nice car.

Of course, a playoff system would be the most exciting and there wouldn't be any arguing about who deserves the national crown. But it's not likely.

First, if there was a playoff that's two or three more games that would cut deep into NFL's playoff time. We all know that bowls are all about money, and the networks would be forced to compete for both NFL and NCAA football network spots and advertising dollars. That would mean the coverage of the college games wouldn't be as big.

Second, it wouldn't be wise to cut into the national history of these bowl games. Games like the Orange Bowl and Rose Bowl have been national treasures. Cutting back on their significance would be tragic.

The BCS hasn't ruled out the playoff system just yet, but it won't be anytime soon. In the meantime, the BCS is a good alternative.

This way, the national championship is decided on the field rather than in the polls, and the added pressures of winning all your games makes the regular season 10 times better. If we had the playoff system, teams might not try as hard during the regular season, but without it, great regular season games like Nebraska/K-State or Florida State/Miami still have meaning.

Well, that's my argument anyway. Nevertheless, it's still a lot more fun to complain about your favorite team not getting into a good bowl.

AROUND CAMPUS

WHO: Sarah Bahari, Collegian city/government editor

BAHARI

Sarah Bahari will be the one in charge next semester.

Bahari, the current city/government editor for the Collegian, will be the editor in chief for spring 2001.

She will be responsible for overseeing all facets of the newspaper including training and supervising the Collegian staff.

Bahari, junior in print journalism, said she is looking forward to her new position.

"The Collegian is already a great newspaper," she said, "but there are always improvements to be made and I'd like to be a part of it."

Besides working at the newspaper, Bahari said she enjoys reading fiction novels and hanging out with friends.

"I like to do normal college student-types of things," she said.

Silent singer performances educate, promote language

By CHELSEA SCHMIDT
Kansas State Collegian

It began as a childhood dream. Susie Stanfield was a sixth-grader in Alabama and a new family had just joined her church.

The family had a girl whom Stanfield was interested in getting to know better. However, this new girl was deaf.

Nevertheless, Stanfield was determined to be her friend.

"I started interpreting church for her," Stanfield said.

By teaching each other, Stanfield and her new friend both entered into a new world — a world where communication became more than just words from the mouth.

From that day, Stanfield knew what she wanted to do when she grew up — she wanted to teach the hearing-impaired.

Stanfield now works as a teacher for the deaf and hard of hearing in Manhattan/Ogden USD 383.

Stanfield works with eight students ranging in ages from one year to 8 years old.

"What I enjoy most is not being with the same age group all day," she said.

Stanfield's job includes working with the classroom teacher and helping to modify the curriculum for the deaf students while also providing academic reinforcement.

Stanfield's sign-language skills aren't only being utilized in the school district, however. She also teaches an advanced sign-language class for the public.

The class meets 19 times from October through mid-March and focuses on conversational skills.

"The classes I teach are community-based," Stanfield said. "I have had college students come to my class. A lot of them have been education majors."

As part of her class, Stanfield has created a sign-language performance group called the Manhattan Silent Singers who perform Christmas carols in a concert for the public each year.

The group, which has different members each year, first performed in 1993 at the governor's tree lighting celebration in Topeka.

"The idea started about 10 years ago when a group of students at K-State called the Talking Hands performed in Topeka," Stanfield said. "The group disbanded, and the coordinator in Topeka got my name to see if the group still existed."

Stanfield decided it would be a beneficial thing for her group to do.

The Manhattan Silent Singers have been performing at the Manhattan Town Center for the past five years.

"I felt it would be a good way to promote sign language in Manhattan because there are not a lot of deaf people in Manhattan," Stanfield said.

This year's performance will be at 6:30 p.m. Thursday.

Stanfield said she thinks about eight or nine individuals will perform with a group song as the finale.

Julie Y. Carver, educational interpreter in Council Grove, will be one of the performers.

"I love music anyway and I love sign language," Carver said. "To have the ability to put those two together and share in that way is the most rewarding to me."

Carver, who has performed with the group one other time in the past, said the members usually draw a diverse crowd.

"I've only done it one other time, but from my understanding there usually is a big crowd of a big variety of people," she said.

She said there also are deaf audience members who come from towns near Manhattan.

Carol Nicholson, who is also an educational interpreter, will be joining Carver and Stanfield in the performance.

"It gives me an opportunity to keep my skills current and to perform and share my love for the language," she said.

Carver said she not only encourages people to see the show, she also encourages them to get involved in sign language itself.

"To me, one of the simplest reasons is you never know when it will be beneficial to you or those around you," Carver said. "It enhances your life so much. It's one more thing to learn, and you can never learn too much."

whom insisted he had a decent chance of prevailing before the state high court with its seven Democratic appointees.

One Gore confidant, who said the cause is all but lost, argued that even if the vice president wanted to leave the race before his legal options are exhausted, internal pressures from the party's base would not allow it.

The advisers spoke on condition of anonymity.

Gore, Bush, lawmakers in Florida, congressmen in Washington, D.C., and scores of judges presiding over the more than 40 lawsuits are focused on two deadlines: Dec. 12, when state electors are chosen, and Dec. 18, when the Electoral College meets.

Without a clear resolution, the Constitution throws the election in the lap of a divided Congress.

"I think whoever wins at the Florida Supreme Court, we'll accept that," Boies said — outlining, for the first time, an end game to the long-count election.

Democrats were glum, though they seemed to be heeding Gore's request to stay by his side until the Florida Supreme Court rules.

"I think we're down but not out," Sen. Barbara Mikulski of Maryland said. "This was a punch that knocked him down, but it didn't knock him out."

Sen. Robert Torricelli, D-N.J., said the case is "a legal issue that at some point becomes an issue of time."

Republicans were in a hurry to hear the bell toll for Gore.

"How many defeats are enough?" said Rep. J.C. Watts, R-Okla., the fourth-ranking member of the House. "The time has come for the vice president to admit defeat."

"Al Gore is facing the longest week of his political life," said Scott Reed, a GOP operative who ran Bob Dole's failed 1996 presidential campaign. "Time has run out, but he won't give up."

Just three days after hearing historic arguments, the U.S. Supreme Court invited Florida's top court to clarify its reasons for extending the deadline for hand-counted ballots in some Democratic counties.

A spokesman for the state high court said briefs were due on that case this afternoon.

REPORT

to 325 per 100,000.

The state earned its highest grade in education, with an A-. High school completion was one of the categories factored into this grade. According to the report card, 82.7 percent of students graduated from high school, which was above the national average of 67.8 percent. How well students did on the American College Test and school readiness factored into this grade.

"The school readiness is a measure of how prepared children are to take advantage of the schooling they will receive," Brunk said. "We want to know by the time they get into kindergarten how well equipped the children are to learn."

In the health category, the state received a B-. Factors that were studied to determine this grade were early prenatal care, the percentage of low birth weight occurrences, infant deaths and immunizations.

Another area of concern is the C- the state received in the teen years category. The teen-age birth rate figured into the state's final grade. While Kansas' birth rate of 47.3 per 1,000 births is below the national average, KAC has set the 2000 goal much lower at 35 births per 1,000. Substance abuse and violent teen deaths were also factored into the equation.

The final area that Kansas was graded on was its child care. The state received another C- in this category. One area that is a concern for Brunk is how the high turnover rate affects the quality of child care.

"What kids need is stability, the ability to relate to a few adults," Brunk said. "Until we do a better job with wages, turnover will still be high."

While Kansas strives to improve the status of its children, KAC continues to work at getting the message out to citizens.

"We work at developing policy we think will make a difference for families," Brunk said. "Ultimately, the impact we have depends on the communities."

Al Myers, one of the founders of the Toys for Manhattan project, is at his home, where toys are piled on the back porch and garage of his house. The project has been in operation for more than 40 years, and anyone who needs toys for Christmas can come pick them up, no questions asked.

Man plans toy giveaway

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Helping children have a good Christmas has been a priority for Manhattan resident Al Myers for more than 40 years.

Myers runs a toy giveaway that helps less fortunate families obtain toys for Christmas.

"It is just a program I started," Myers said. "Well, I mean I started it and it's my program, but it really has turned into a community thing."

Myers, a retired policeman, started the program after a domestic call his first year on the squad during the holiday season.

"We were called to this house, and when we got there, our hearts just filled up," he said. "There was 11 children in the family, and they had this scrawny tree with only a few presents. It broke our hearts."

Myers said he and his fellow officers went home to invade their toy boxes in hopes of finding some toys for the children.

"When we took them the toys they were completely overjoyed," he said. "They thought they had the world by the tail."

Myers and a few other officers continued the tradition, and it now has grown into a community wide event.

"Here we are, 40 years later and we are still going strong," he said. "It is just something that caught a hold, and I really don't know how to explain how. We tried different things, and some worked and some didn't, and that is how we got to where we are now."

Myers said they are collecting enough toys to help more than 450 kids.

"It just keeps growing," he said.

"People bring in used toys and then sometimes they stop at the toy store and pick up something new. Of course, we kick the new toys around a few times to make them used so it is fair to everyone."

Local groups, along with individuals, help bring in the toys for Myers' giveaway. This year, the local group All Bikers Aim Towards Education had their 14th annual Toy Run to raise money and toys for the cause.

Richard Harrison, chairman of the toy run, said it was the least his chapter could do for Myers.

"He has such a huge heart and his cause is great," Harrison said. "We were more than happy to help out because of the wonderful thing he is doing."

Graduation rates show influence of policies

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

K-State graduation rates haven't fared well in recent studies, but the statistics might be misleading.

Students and athletes who entered the university in 1993 graduated at a rate below the national average, but according to Pat Bosco, associate vice president of institutional advancement, a variety of factors need to be taken into consideration.

"I think a significant difference between K-State and other major universities is that during this period of time, we had open admissions. So, that counts every student enrolling in the university, regardless of their ACT."

"When you take that into account, and add to it the reputation of our pre-professional health programs, we do pretty well."

Such pre-professional programs, including pre-health studies like pre-nursing and pre-physical therapy, are offered at K-State, but a degree cannot be earned in that particular field.

As a result, students actually come to the Little Apple with the intent of leaving early, even before they set foot on campus, Bosco said.

"They're predestined to leave, and we're helping them do that. That's part of our job," he said. "But Fort Riley's the same way. We're 50 miles away from a major Army installation, and there's a transitory population."

"So, you have to look at these figures from the grand scheme of things, that you're really not comparing apples to oranges."

However, that doesn't mean K-State wouldn't like graduation numbers to increase, Bosco said.

"We'd like to do better, of course, but given the transitory nature of a portion of our students, including Fort Riley, it makes for an unfair comparison," he said.

One such comparison concerns K-State athletics. According to reports from the National Collegiate Athletic Association, of the Wildcat athletes who enrolled as freshmen in '93, only 56 percent earned their diplomas, two percentage points lower than the national average of 58 percent.

In addition, K-State football players who entered seven years ago graduated at a 47-percent rate, one percent below the national mark.

From there, football team members are broken down into race. Nationally, 42 percent of black football players and 55 percent of white football players who entered in '93 graduated. K-State, on the other hand, had just 37 percent of its black Small fists rubbed tired eyes in the preschool room. Naptime was just ending for the children in the KSU Child Development Center, and the quiet was fading into a chorus of giggles and joyous shrieks.

Some children played with blocks or puzzles on the floor and another group played house in the corner.

It would not seem this childish jubilation would be learning, but it was. The center, which is open to children of students, alumni, faculty and staff, emphasizes learning through play.

As children play house, they learn manners, how to set a table and how to build language skills.

"We are not an academic-focused center," preschool teacher Kristi Decker said. "We don't give them worksheets. We don't tell them to color the eyes blue.

"We have them focus on each other. We let them see that other children have blue eyes just like them."

The teachers might take an activity in which the students look at the colors of each others eyes and turn it into a math lesson. They count how many children have blue, brown or green eyes.

Angela Allison, center director, said teachers try not to force children into situations they aren't ready for. They might give children pencils and pieces of paper. If the children want to learn to write their names, the teachers will help.

Union art gallery, Little Theatre improvements slated thanks to gifts

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

The K-State Student Union recently received four gifts in correlation with a new "Friends of the K-State Union Student Union" fund-raising campaign.

The first gift, $100,000 from the William T. Kemper Foundation, Commerce Bank Trustee, will be used to renovate the Union art gallery and support other facility enhancements.

"The money we get from the donations will be used for services and facilities that can be used by the students and the community," said Cindie Snyder, marketing and promotions manager for the Union. "For example, the renovation to the art gallery will be something that many people can enjoy."

The second gift, a $100,000 donation from the Dane G. Hansen Foundation, will be used to upgrade the Union Little Theatre with furnishings and high-tech communication technology systems to create a multipurpose room.

The Little Theatre is used for lectures, small catering events, breakout meetings, small musical performances and films. The contribution from the Hansen Foundation will allow the room to accommodate distance learning, video conferencing, technical and specialized workshops and training sessions.

The final gifts were in the form of in-kind service and monetary contributions from two new members. They include the Ken Ebert Design Group with $10,000 for a lifetime membership and the Alpha Delta Pi Sorority with a gift of a Union Plaza bench and artwork at a Konza Level membership.

The money from the Ken Ebert Design Group will be used specifically for Union facility improvements.

"The Friends' campaign is a meaningful thing because it is a way for people to come back into the Union and see how they are helping current students," Snyder said.

"There are a few number of current and past students that will remember the leadership experience they received at the Union and will want to give back to help other students. This is a way they can if they are in a position to."

Colbert Hills discussing tax amount with county

Colbert Hills Golf Course got more than it bargained for — a higher tax bill.

Sam Schmidt, country appraiser, said original projections for the golf course were not correct due to expansion, including the addition of a separate executive golf course.

"There's always going to be changes," he said.

The K-State Golf Course Management and Research Foundation was expecting a figure around $56,000 in property taxes, but it received a bill for double the amount and did not think it was fair.

"The land value was higher than anticipated," said Monte Griffin, executive director of the foundation.

Schmidt said there is a difference of opinion in the value of the property.

Colbert Hills cannot be subject to normal tax regulations because of its ties to K-State and because it is a nonprofit organization. By law, the golf course is not required to pay any property taxes, he said.

Griffin said Colbert Hills and K-State want to do their part in contributing to the community, but the 2000 tax bill goes against what they expected at the time of the original proposal for the golf course.

"We're not prepared to file our tax exempt form at this point, but we're working with the county and its appraisers to come to some sort of agreement," he said.

The foundation is in the process of putting together a proposal to see if it can be partially exempt from the property taxes. After the county reviews the proposal, it will be sent on to the State Board of Appeals.

"We want to pay our fair share like we've always intended," Griffin said. "We just need to reach a fair solution for both parties."

Missouri students killed, injured in crash of SUV

BOLIVAR, Mo. — In the latest tragedy to strike one of Missouri's colleges, a sport utility vehicle crash early Sunday, killing two Southwest Baptist basketball players and the husband of a volleyball player. Two other student athletes were injured.

In all, five Southwest Baptist students — from a tight-knit student body of about 1,800 — have been killed in traffic accidents this year.

The Missouri State Highway Patrol said the latest crash happened shortly after 2 a.m. Sunday, when the northbound Jeep Cherokee ran off Missouri 13 about 10 miles north of Springfield and hit tree, then caught fire.

Passengers Gregory Germany of Rogersville, and Mary Miller of Niangua, were pronounced dead at the scene, the patrol said. Germany was a member of the men's basketball team, and Miller played for the women's team.

Bryon Phillips of Anna, Ill., was pronounced dead at a Springfield hospital. He was the husband of Southwest Baptist volleyball player Leslie Phillips.

The driver, Tyler Wasmer, a football player from Independence, and a fourth passenger, women's basketball player Jaime Roszell of Neosho, suffered serious injuries, the patrol said.

On Jan. 23, Southwest Baptist students Jay Wetzel and Sara Nicole McGaha were among 10 people killed in a 10-car pileup on icy Interstate 29 northwest of Kansas City, Mo.

On Nov. 9, Park's head women's soccer coach and two players died in a crash on Interstate 70 near Concordia. The team had been on its way to St. Charles for a playoff game against Lindenwood.

A plane crash near Branson last Dec. 9 killed six people, all of whom were associated with the College of the Ozarks.

Less than a month later, early on New Year's Day, a student from the school was killed when the car he was in skidded off the road and flipped near Bradleyville, just west of Branson.

FDA considers making morning-after pill OTC

ORLANDO, Fla. — Stepping into a morally charged debate Tuesday, the American Medical Association called on the Food and Drug Administration to consider making the morning-after pill available over the counter.

The AMA's policy-making House of Delegates approved the resolution without discussion during a convention in Orlando. The AMA has 293,000 doctors as members.

Taken within three days of sexual intercourse, the prescription morning-after pill prevents ovulation or, if that already has occurred, blocks implantation of a fertilized egg in the uterus. AMA members suggested that some women might not be able to get the pill in time to prevent a pregnancy unless they are made available over the counter.

The morning-after pill essentially is a high-dose birth control pill. It is different from the RU-486 abortion pill, which acts by causing contractions to expel an embryo from the uterus. RU-486 can be taken up to seven weeks after the start of the last of a cab driver

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Her car shows her personality. Holiday decals saying "Merry Christmas," pictures of bells adorn the windows and an angel is clipped to the visor.

Inside the car sits Diane Hughes, a Manhattan taxi driver, with her nails painted red and green, and a Santa hat upon her head.

She loves the holiday, her car and her job. "I get to run my mouth, drive and get paid for it," Hughes said.

She said she gets to meet people from all around the globe, which is one reason she loves her job so much.

"Once there was an ESPN crew guy," she said. "He said he'd been all over the world."

Her usual hours are from 6 a.m. to 6 p.m., although she also works some nights and holidays.

Because she never knows what's going to happen in a day's work, every day is an adventure.

"It's crazy," Hughes said. "You don't get tired of it because it always changes."

Some of her customers she expects to see, though. They are the ones who rely on her on a daily basis to get them where they need to go.

"You get regulars, and then they turn into more than just customers," Hughes said. "You can unload anything on cab drivers. They're kind of like bartenders. You get to know each other's life stories. You get to hear a lot of neat things."

Laughing, she referred to them as "cab confessions." She works hard to take care of her customers, she said, to give them a good, friendly, safe ride — and on time. Her regular customers vary from those who just don't have a car, to those who cannot drive themselves, such as the mentally disabled.

"You have to be able to figure out what they're saying or already know where they're going," she said.

Over the radio, a call came in. It was for a customer to be picked up on Fremont Street, but their destination was unknown, Hughes already knew, though. It was one of her mentally disabled patients she'd come to know quite well.

"You going to work, Cindy?" she asked her customer as she got in the car.

Cindy Clark, the customer, said yes, and Hughes knew exactly where to take her. The friendly service is something Clark said she enjoyed, and had always experienced with Hughes and the taxi-cab service.

"They're nice people and they treat customers right," Clark said.

Hughes said she used to take Clark and her husband to bowl. Though they no longer bowl, Hughes still could recall what place they received in the Special Olympics.

Her customers are something she loves, and she loves them all.

"After a while, it feels like family. You gotta take care of that person," she said. "They depend on you."

Born and raised in Manhattan, Hughes said she rarely gets lost. That's not a problem in her job. The only problem in her job is being in the car with an unfriendly customer.

"The worst passenger is picking up someone that won't talk," she said.

Every once in a while she picks up a passenger who is mad at the world and takes it out on her.

"People are people, so I don't let it get to me. People aren't worth letting you get upset over," Hughes said.

Instead of letting it get to her, she tries to change the mood of the situation.

"There's all kinds of people in the world, and in every bunch there's a bad apple," Hughes said. "I just smile and laugh at them. I try to make them laugh — lighten it up."

Making people laugh is one of her goals.

"I feel like if a customer gets out of my cab and has laughed, then I've done my job," she said.

There was only one thing Hughes said wishes was different about her job.

"I wish people would tip more. People don't like to tip," she said. "People will give me their change or an extra dollar, but when the Sooners came to town, they were tipping me 20 bucks apiece. It seems like the out-of-towners tip you better than your own."

Other than that, Hughes had nothing negative to say about her job.

"I just want to see them smile, get out and say, 'I want to call that cab again. That was a good ride,'" she said. "That's what it's all about — giving the customer a good, safe ride."

Speech students propose changes to improve campus

By ALLISON RUSHTON
Kansas State Collegian

Six students presented speeches to an audience of about 100 people Tuesday afternoon in Nichols Theatre, calling for changes on campus.

Various issues were addressed, including the need for a campus Saferide system, an updated campus smoking policy, breast cancer awareness, a permanent endowment for the K-State cheer squad, pedestrian crossing signals and a change in the KATS enrollment system.

Phil Anderson, instructor in public speaking, said all the speeches were designed to persuade listeners to get involved in changing some aspect of campus life.

"I'm attempting to show them how democracy happens," Anderson said. "How they can start with an idea, go through the proper channels and make changes."

Some changes on campus are already starting to take effect.

Travis Hecht, senior in agricultural business, presented a speech titled, "Is that fresh air I smell? KSU needs to update their smoking policy!"

Hecht said since smoking in buildings is not permitted on campus, it is common for smokers to gather outside doorways for a cigarette. He said he feels it is unfair for non-smoking students and faculty members to have to inhale secondhand smoke while entering and exiting buildings.

Hecht said he proposed that K-State update its smoking policy to include a rule that every building have one entrance where smoking is not permitted within 20 feet of the door.

The university is looking into the issue and considering the proposed change.

Every presenter urged the audience to listen to their cause and help make a change, in most cases by signing a petition.

Beth Drass, senior in marketing, presented a speech titled, "Of course students drink; that's why we need a safe way to get home!" She said she believes K-State needs to implement a system to help avoid intoxicated people from driving or walking home alone late at night.

She said that by adding two or three dollars to the student privilege fee, K-State could have a system comparable to that of most other Big 12 universities.

"We all deserve safety," Drass said as she encouraged students to sign a petition that she intends to present to the Student Senate.

Anderson said his advanced public speaking classes every semester elect the best speeches to be presented to the student body. The speeches focus on campus issues, and Anderson said sometimes the speeches do result in changes that affect the entire student body.

"In 1985, a student halted $6.5 million plans to tear down Nichols Theatre and turn it into a parking lot," Anderson said. "In order to make a change, you can't just have a plan."

"Passion and tenacity are the key to success. That's what I try to get across to my students."

K-State donors should research funding areas

Whenever K-State receives a generous donation or a gift from university friends or alumni, the donors are to be commended. These donations help provide current as well as future students with a higher quality education.

However, sometimes the gifts and donations need to be dispersed evenly.

More than $200,000 in donations recently have gone to assisting the K-State Student Union.

For instance, the Union art gallery received money to use for renovations. While the gallery is a deserving recipient, it brings up the question of how much money an art gallery needs. Are the decorations not the actual art that is part of the exhibit?

The Union deserves money because it is — and can be — appealing to the student body as well as prospective students. However, the rest of Union was the beneficiary of the one of the campus' most recent renovations.

There are other areas that need to be examined before we start focusing so much attention just on the Union. For instance, Hale Library is one of K-State's neediest areas. It often is referred to as "hollow," and that is a shame, but a candid one at that.

There is a need for more computers and services that will assist students with completing assignments and projects.

There also are the obvious problems of flooding buildings and the seemingly never-ending parking pains.

Other areas need donations just as much, if not more, than the Union.

We are not ungrateful for the generosity of those who have been here before, but we are questioning why it isn't going to what really needs to be fixed.

Right now there are problems that need to be fixed. The only problem? It appears we are all show and no substance.

The Collegian's Campus Fourum is an anonymous call-in system that allows readers to voice their opinions on topics relevant to the publication.

For over a year, everyday in the news we'd see that George W. Bush was on the campaign trail. Now, every day we see he is talking with other Republican leaders on his ranch. Who, for the last year or so, has been governing Texas?

■ No more Gore.

■ Say it ain't so, Cats. Say it ain't so.

■ Hey, Max, I think we are going to need an official statement on this pretty soon.

■ In Cooper's defense, he has played terrible all year.

■ Yeah, alcohol consumption statistics brought to us from someone who might actually know what they are talking about. You go, Anheuser Busch.

■ Why should we students pay more for Lafene if they can't correctly diagnosis us to begin with?

■ If you haven't seen the Kansas State men's basketball team play, and, judging by the attendance, you haven't, you are missing quite a show. They are full potential and tremendous up-sight.

■ Yeah, this is for those nerds who thought David Allen should be returning the punts. Well, he can't catch them, and Aaron Lockett's averaging 22.77 yards per return, so I think he is doing all right. So give him his kudos. Peace out.

■ Football is not about records. It's about the W. Way to go, Aaron Lockett.

HE'S MAKING HIS LIST

ing it twice

Deciding on proper, appreciated gifts can prove difficult

'Tis the season. Yep, amid all the spiritual reflection which accompanies the end of the year comes the perfectly American challenge of getting holiday gifts (Yes, you can tell I've been properly conditioned to shrug my habits of referring to "Christmas" season and alter the references to "holiday" season, becoming more vague and thus inclusive. I'd be more pepped up about this time of year if we could not get our collective tights in a bunch over petty semantics, but that's another column. Forgive me if I revert back to form, as I'm merely the product of my environment. Nyeh.).

Part of the peril of the season is making that list, to say nothing of checking it twice. While it's a season which speaks and rings of generosity, let's swallow the pill of giddiness with a spoonful of reality. Maybe you've developed deep emotional bonds with the delivery man or the guy down the block who sits on his porch and watches you put your clothes on the line. This does not burden you with the moral obligation to buy them collectors' edition Hummels (I won't tell you what spell-check suggests here). You don't need to buy a turquoise brooch for the angry checker at the supermarket who lets the scanning laser burn a whole through your ice cream before kicking it into the parking lot.

Your list of people to be treated should be handled like a pro-football roster: take the very best, trim them down a few times, and cut people as you need (just don't take any hints from the Washington Redskins). You'll have draft picks and franchise players on your list. You'll pick up some free agents. And if you want to throw in a special-teamer or two (the old friend at the convenience store who charged you 18 cents for nine gallons of coffee), by all means, do so. Take this select — if not elite — roster and shower it with happiness. Just don't sign any long-term contracts.

So now you've got 43 or so truly worthy people on that Christmas list. What do you get them? If you're like me, you're prone to this twisted set of logic: 1. Find something in store you want. 2. Cannot justify buying thing for yourself. 3. Buy thing for a person on the Christmas list. 4. Live vicariously through them.

5. Get restraining order slapped on self after begging into the phone. "But please use the label maker! Let me hear it buzz!"

No, buying others presents you'd enjoy

KEN WELLS

often leads straight to certain, utter doom. Consider it karma backlash for not towing that whole "season of giving" line. You could attempt to enter the other person's mind and divine their own needs and wants. Perils? Too many to list. Just imagining stepping into the Picasso-esque perceptions and mindframe of my sister, well, it makes "The Cell" look like "A Charlie Brown Christmas." I don't want to spend New Year's drooling into my shoes again.

And here's a problem — do you attempt to fulfill a "need" or a "want" with Christmas presents? OK, I know we're all about utility and practicality. But there's something discordant in getting socks for Christmas (even electric socks). We want our presents to have a little pizzazz, a little "wow" factor. Unless they're four-dimensional socks,

What I think a present — be it Christmas, birthday, anniversary or Ray Bourque's birthday (21 shopping days left, people) — should reflect is the bridge between a giver and the recipient. If I'm giving something to you, I want it to be part of, well, us. If you like the St. Louis Rams and I, say, like cows, maybe you'll get a cow wearing a Rams jersey (or Kurt Warner wearing a cowbell). I figure whoever's getting the present is familiar enough with their needs that I, as a gift-giver, can take a stab at finding something they might not even realize they want.

Of course, there are still those purists who will insist that the true spirit of the season means seeing beyond the crass commercialism and simple materialism, of finding the higher purpose behind the season and that keeping that purpose alive and well in your heart — long beyond the holiday's passing — is the true meaning of the season.

So we won't have to shop for them.

Teacher salaries low compared to other professions

I can name every single one of my teachers from kindergarten to the sixth grade. It is not a difficult task because each of them were special in their own way.

There was my first grade teacher who I forced into early retirement.

There was my third grade teacher who brought me to tears when she dumped my desk out because it was too messy. There was my fifth grade teacher who got knocked up at the beginning of the year and, to my amusement, voted Dukakis. And there was my sixth grade teacher who treated his students to KU football games and NCAA tournament watch parties.

Though all of these educators certainly were different, they all had one thing in common. They all were underpaid.

This fall, my mom started her 29th year in teaching, with most of those years being in the third grade. She has taught for the same school district for more than 25 years. In the ultimate proof of longevity, she has had previous students' children in her classroom.

Unfortunately, my mom teaches in Shawnee Heights U.S.D. 450 outside Topeka. While surrounding school districts have been offering their teachers 3-, 4- or 5-percent raises, my mom has consistently seen her salary been raised by 1 percent or less.

I would like someone to tell me in what other profession you could be working for nearly 30 years with a master's degree and still be earning less than $40,000 a year. I know several friends who started their first jobs from graduation at more than that amount.

Sure, some will give the argument that engineers and actuaries are more in demand and will be able to demand more money. But teaching already is approaching a state in which many school districts will be unable to fill all staff positions. In Texas and Tennessee you can be a teacher without proper certification. I have seen some recent PSAs that encourage wealthy professionals to give up their current positions to become an educator. It indeed is a sad day when people must build up a fortune to be able to teach our country's future.

What is even more frustrating is the fact that members of my mother's school board have tried to convince the staff that there is no more money available for salaries. This is interesting, considering they have had paid trips to Orlando and San Francisco for conferences at taxpayers' expense and the superintendent was rewarded with a salary bonus.

In their reporting to the state, U.S.D. 450 listed the school board trips under the line item "Expanding Technology Fund." This would be comparable to my explaining to my mom that my trips to Aggieville could be filed under "Social Mind Expanding Fund." It is amazing that they feel the need to literally steal money from teachers when school board members represent some of the most affluent of the district's residents (for example, dentists and property developers).

Other Shawnee County school districts have resorted to passing bond issues to finance new schools, additions, and "substantive" technology improvements. U.S.D. 450 has resisted such a move claiming that the district's poor residents would not be able to afford an increase in tax levy. Shawnee Heights is far from a poor school district. I suspect the real reason is that certain members of the school board (property developers) would see a drop in demand if there happened to be an increase in taxes.

After next year, my mom will be able to retire and receive full benefits. At that time she will be legally able to run for a position on her school board.

If she doesn't run, I will. You see, aristocracy isn't just with the Bushes and the Gores. It is most prevalent at the local level.

I encourage each of you to be active at whatever level to be able to actively influence the world around you. As we recently have learned from Florida, every vote counts.

Tennessee team obnoxious; fans needed at bowl game

Editor,

Greetings from Tennessee. I'd like to take a few minutes of your time to explain the attitude of a Tennessee Vols fan ... You know how obnoxious Nebraska fans are? Multiply that by 10.

Down here in Tennessee, the general consensus is that any place outside the SEC just doesn't know how to play football. They think the SEC invented football and the rest of the country just imitates the game. As a 1991 graduate of K-State living in Vols Country and surrounded at work by avid Tennessee fans, I am very much looking forward to seeing our Cats show the Vols what it really means to play football.

I encourage Cat fans everywhere to make the trip to Dallas to cheer for our team. Let's paint that stadium purple and show these Orange-clad Tennesseans just how strong Purple Power is. At the office I am a single Wildcat among a multitude of Vols.

Believe me when I say my voice will be heard cheering K-State on to a Cotton Bowl win. The K-State Fight Song and "Wabash Cannonball" will drown out all sounds of Rocky Top here in Memphis, Tennessee!

Editor,

Basketball season is here.

I'll say it again. Basketball season is here.

After checking the announced attendance figure for the game with Illinois, I felt it was necessary to remind folks that we DO have a men's basketball team.

Yes, there is another football game remaining. But right now it's basketball season. The teams need you, in the stands, on your feet, loud and in person.

A half-empty (or worse) arena is not too appealing to a recruit on a campus visit.

A friend has, on his Web site, a letter from members of the '74 team. Check it out at www.dty.com/cats.html and read what they said. The Cats need you. I'll be there as often as I can.

Students sponsoring clothes drive

By AMBER CUNNINGHAM
Kansas State Collegian

K-State students have the opportunity to give warmth to a person in need this holiday season.

An apparel and textile marketing interest group is sponsoring its first clothing drive for the Women's Crisis Center, "Provide Warmth."

The clothing drive has two purposes: to help women and children in the Manhattan area and to promote awareness of the Apparel and Textile Marketing Club.

Jana Kalusha, junior in apparel and textile marketing, said she hopes the clothing drive will get more people involved with both the community and the club.

"We have collected more than expected already," Kalusha said. "We'll see what we can do this year, and hopefully we can make improvements for next year."

Kalusha said they are starting small this year, advertising only in Justin Hall.

She said boxes have been set out in Justin to collect clothes and other warmth items like gloves scarves and hats.

"The shelter is looking for hats, gloves, scarves, blankets and sweat-shirts for the women and all types and sizes of clothing for children," Kalusha said. "The clothing needs to be used clothing in good condition or new clothing."

She said they especially need children's clothing.

Kalusha said the drive began Nov. 29 and will end Monday when she picks up the boxes.

Kalusha said she has enjoyed this experience, as she rarely has time to do community service acts.

"Whenever I can involve school activities with helping someone in need, I do it," she said. "It was just a good thing to do."

Mindy Prince, senior in apparel and textile marketing, said she feels most people take the things they have for granted.

"I am a strong advocate for women's needs and like to provide help when I can," Prince said. "Many people take the clothes they have for granted. Rather than selling clothes to a secondhand store, why not give them to someone who really needs them?"

Melody LeHew, assistant professor of apparel and textile marketing, said she is excited the club is getting involved.

"We wanted to do something for the season," LeHew said. "Our organization has been stagnant the past few years, but I'm happy to see us get moving and hope we stay motivated."

Already in the spirit of the season, Kalusha said an early Christmas party started the clothing drive off with a bang.

"We had our club Christmas party the night before the drive began," Kalusha said. "Instead of bringing presents for each other we brought clothes for the shelter."

Anyone interested in giving this season can bring a donation to Justin Hall and place it in one of the many boxes located throughout the building.

Gore continues to fight

By RON FOURNIER
Associated Press

Al Gore suggested Tuesday that even a rejection of his Florida Supreme Court appeal might not drive him from the presidential race, though many Democrats said that would be the limit of their loyalty.

Indiana Sen. Evan Bayh, a finalist in Gore's summertime search for a running mate, was among those warning that Gore had one last chance.

"The Florida Supreme Court is going to rule in two or three days, and if he's unsuccessful on that, then I think that is the end of it," he said.

Four weeks into America's election limbo, the courts still held the keys to the White House: The Florida Supreme Court agreed to hear an appeal of Gore's historic election challenge to George W. Bush's certified Florida victory; briefs were filed in response to the U.S. Supreme Court decision; and oral arguments were heard at a federal appeals court in Atlanta.

The flurry of activity came one day after Circuit Judge N. Sanders Sauls rejected Gore's request to order hand recounts of disputed ballots and overturn Florida's official election results. Gore appealed, and oral arguments will be heard by the Florida high court Thursday.

The could-be presidents responded in different ways, Gore by rallying Democratic troops for his last stand and Bush by acting as if his presidency was only a matter of time.

Gore dispatched running mate Joseph Lieberman to Capitol Hill, where Democrats pledged their support — at least until the Florida high court rules on Gore's appeal.

Neither candidate can top the required 270 electoral votes without winning Florida's 25, which Bush's certified 537-vote victory would give him.

Gore advisers said privately they made the Florida high court their final destination to calm Democrats who were clamoring for an end to the race. Many Democrats said they understood the appeal of Sauls' decision to be Gore's last-ditch bid for the presidency.

But the vice president seemed to be rolling back from that end game scenario, telling reporters that he was concerned about allegations of favoritism toward Bush in the handling of absentee ballot applications in two Florida counties.

Democrats filed lawsuits in Seminole and Martin counties over the ballot applications. A trial in the Seminole case is scheduled for Wednesday, and Gore's advisers said there might be a ruling by the end of the week — perhaps before the Supreme Court — on the Sauls appeal.

"I do think it's likely that all of the current controversies will end up being resolved, one way or another, in the Florida Supreme Court," Gore said.

Gore's remarks were the latest twist in a convoluted case: The vice president, who has argued that every vote should count, is now embracing legal action seeking to throw out thousands of absentee ballots.

Despite the vice president's hesitation, top Democratic aides on Capitol Hill said there will be calls for Gore to concede if the seven Florida justices — all Democratic appointees — upholds Sauls' decision.

Outside Washington D.C., rank-and-file Democrats said Gore had a right to fight in the state Supreme Court but they had little hope for a positive ruling. Many criticized Republicans or the judicial system for blocking recounts. Others second guessed the Gore team.

Democratic state Sen. Chris Cummiskey of Arizona pointed to the U.S. Supreme Court decision Monday to set aside a state high court ruling allowing some recounts.

"Unfortunately, I think this is the end for the vice president," he said.

Party leaders stood behind Gore out of loyalty to him and, more significantly, concern about their own futures. No Democrat wants to abandon the vice president too soon, and risk alienating minority voters and key core constituencies who have made the election a political crusade.

Republicans were more optimistic as GOP running mate Dick Cheney visited Capitol Hill.

"I expect the courts will speak again with finality," House Speaker Dennis Hastert said.

The fierce fight for Florida's 25 electoral votes spawned more than 40 separate lawsuits that threaten to tie up the 2000 presidential race beyond a Dec. 12 deadline for states to assign electors and the Dec. 18 meeting of the Electoral College.

In Atlanta, the U.S. Appeals Court heard arguments in two separate but related appeals from Bush supporters fighting recounts. The Florida Democratic Party has argued there is no need for the appeals court to rule on the matter since manual recounts are finished and Bush has been certified the winner in the state.

Steve Bietau is in his 17th season as head coach of the Wildcat women's tennis squad. Bietau looks forward to the 2001 spring season with the return of Alena Jecminkova and Petra Sedlmajerova to lead the team.

A CHANGE OF HEART

Bietau's dreams of playing football lead to coaching tennis teams

By JASON ARY
Kansas State Collegian

K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau's idol growing up might be surprising to some. One might expect a response of John McEnroe, Arthur Ashe or Jimmy Connors, but to Bietau, the man he idolized and wanted to be was the one and only ... Dick Butkus.

As a teen-ager, Bietau longed for his opportunity to play competitive football, but by Thanksgiving, the season had wrapped up. His football coaches told him he needed to stay fit and healthy, and said joining the track squad was the answer.

"My football coaches told me I had to go out for track, but it didn't take me long to realize I didn't like it whatsoever," Bietau said, "so I decided to pick up a racket and start playing some tennis."

As the high school years passed, Bietau found himself playing tennis more and more.

"We had a great tennis squad at my high school — we had a great coach and we were very competitive," he said. "Actually, several guys on the tennis team with me went on to play Division I-A, and one even played professionally for several years."

That competitive nature, instilled in him by the tennis squad, lingered long after graduation. While attending a local community college in his hometown, he began to realize how much he missed the invigorating nature of sports.

"I knew I didn't have a future in football — I wasn't the biggest, and I wasn't the best — but tennis stuck with me," Bietau said. "My second year at junior college, some friends and I decided we'd try out for the tennis team. We made the squad and actually went on to qualify for nationals."

It was during this pivotal year of tennis that Bietau first recognized his love for the game grew beyond the lines painted on the court.

"I began to realize that I wanted to do something with this. I knew this was something for me to stick with," he said.

After concluding his collegiate career, Bietau began his hunt for a career opportunity, and found one in Hutchinson, Kan.

Bietau landed two jobs in Hutchinson, one as an instructor at Prairie Dunes Country Club, and the other as coach at Hutchinson Community College.

"Prairie Dunes was where I made my living," Bietau said, "but at juco, I realized that I really was having a lot of fun coaching."

In 1984, an opening appeared on the courts of K-State, one for a new tennis coach. Bietau, not one to miss an opportunity, applied and soon found himself at the helm of the Wildcat program.

"It felt great, but when I arrived here I realized the program was awful, just awful. We had both a men's and women's program at the time, and our budget, which included scholarships, salaries, and operating budgets, came in only at $52,000."

"I knew I didn't have a future in football — I wasn't the biggest, and I wasn't the best — but tennis stuck with me."

Steve Bietau, tennis coach

Adding to the inadequacies at K-State at the time was the lack of scholarships.

"We had three or 3 1/2 scholarships to give out, total, between both programs," Bietau said. "Almost everywhere else gave out eight full rides per team."

It was that discrepancy that Bietau wasted no time in attacking first.

"First thing I did was to consolidate the scholarship money, so instead of giving out a couple of grand here and there, we could go out and get one solid player to build the program around. Then I knew we could recruit locally, and slowly build the program up."

As Bietau began to make vital improvements to the program, he found a little bit of luck on his side.

"Thankfully, when I arrived our funding also began to improve. For financial reasons, our men's program was dropped, but that, in turn, doubled our women's budget. A couple of years later a student-athlete fee was passed, which made (tennis) completely funded for scholarships, which finally gave us eight full scholarships."

Bietau has never expected the program to turn around over night, though, but knows it's been making steady progress.

"I knew that what counted was what you made out of what you had," Bietau said, "and I think, dollar-for-dollar, we've done a good job of doing that. Our program is as competitive as it's ever been."

Bietau said he believes K-State has the capability to go far in the near future, with veterans Alena Jecminkova and Petra Sedlmajerova leading the squad. In addition, Bietau recently signed local Manhattan High School senior Maria Rosenberg to a letter of intent for the 2001-02 season.

Rosenberg, whose two-year record at Manhattan High was 61-1, went on to post a perfect 33-0 season on her way to the state title this last fall. Rosenberg, a native of Russia, will be joining the K-State tennis squad, which is dominated by players from other countries.

"It's simply a numbers thing. If you look at the girls in the (United) States, they'd have to rank in the top-150 nationally at the high school level to help us. Of those 150, half of them are juniors, so you have maybe 75 girls with probably 500 scholarships available nationwide every year."

"Places like the Czech Republic, though, there's really only three sports — soccer, hockey and tennis. In Australia, tennis is arguably the most popular sport there, so you will have a lot of talent in those places."

BCS incorrect; Miami should be in title game

It might seem like an easy job, but there are a great many sober, important responsibilities inherent in good sports journalism. Oh sure, there's the part about weaseling into football games for free and ransacking the accompanying buffets, but ... well, that's the big one, actually.

But beyond that, we're also charged with providing a voice to the voiceless, hope to the hopeless, and puns to the punless — stuff like that. That's why today I'm putting down my free pizza long enough to take a stand against tyranny, and admit my own mistakes.

Earlier in the semester, I wrote that it was foolish to obsess over poll and ranking numbers in college football because everything eventually would fall into its appointed place. I was wrong — Miami got screwed. My apologies to the Hurricanes.

K-State's has had legitimate claims to unfairness in the system the past two years, but its slights pale in comparison to Miami's. For the 10-1 Hurricanes, who are ranked No. 2 in both the Associated Press and Coaches' Polls, to be excluded from the Orange Bowl in favor of a Florida State team they trounced earlier in the season is ridiculous.

The computer or statistical glitch in the BCS that created this quandary opens the door for a possible split national championship — the very thing that the BCS was designed to prevent. Whether it comes to pass or not, I've seen all the proof I need to know that the current system is flawed.

So how do we correct the system? We don't. No matter how comprehensive a computer formula is created, there always will be glitches and loopholes. It simply doesn't make sense that after deciding fate on the field of play all season long, the NCAA then allows its most important battle to be fought inside some iMac's hard drive.

The fact is that the championships and postseason berths can only truly and fairly be decided in the same place everything else is — on the playing field. That's why I'm leading another doomed, lemming-like push for a playoff system in college football.

There are currently 25 postseason bowl games played in D-1A, not counting the postseason all-star games played for NFL scouts. Looking down the list, I'm interested in maybe six of those 25 matchups.

Look at the list sometime and you'll see my point. Most bowls today are tradition-free corporate creations featuring matchups with all the raw, visceral excitement of watching a test pattern for three hours. You probably didn't even know a few of these schools HAD football programs.

Proponents of the bowl system say that ending it would ruin a rich tradition and deprive good teams of a chance to compete. Give me a break. Maybe in a precious few cases, but realistically, no one would notice if you canceled 75 percent of the bowl matchups this year.

Others say it would be too much a drain on student-athletes. Get real. A 16-team playoff would take scarcely longer than the 13- and 14-game schedules that are becoming almost routine.

And despite bowl proponents' objections, I think you could raise more money through a playoff system. Imagine the hype surrounding each game — it would be March Madness projected onto the gridiron. That would

Junior wide-out leads nation, K-State with punt-return average

Aaron Lockett has returned punts for a better average than any returner in K-State history, including David Allen. Lockett's 22.8 yards per return also leads the nation.

But he might not have truly gained national respect until he returned a punt 58 yards for a touchdown against top-ranked Oklahoma in Saturday's Big 12 Championship.

"I think a lot of people are starting to realize that I can run once I get free," Lockett said. "I know if I get a crease, I'm going to hit it, and I don't think there's anybody in college football that can catch me once I'm gone."

Because of that speed, no team can really contain one of the best return men of all time. Earlier in the season, Lockett became one of only three people to ever return punts for touchdowns in consecutive games when he did so against Louisiana Tech and North Texas.

"I don't think there's many people that can really hold me," Lockett said. "That's just my perception when it comes to running with the football. I think they're more worried than I am."

Of course, one of the other people to return punts for touchdowns to games in a row is current K-Stater David Allen, who at the beginning of the season was just one TD return short of breaking the oldest record in college football. After 13 games, however, Allen still hasn't broken the record, and, now that the regular season is over, he never will.

"I feel badly for him. I sure do," head coach Bill Snyder said, and Allen isn't chipper about it himself.

"You have to have some feelings about that," Snyder said of the senior. "He's not an iceman. He has some emotions about it."

With Allen graduating after this season, that leaves Lockett all alone to carry on the K-State tradition of feared punt returners. And Lockett most likely will be feared, especially since he's still improving.

"Now that I have a year under my belt, I'm kind of anticipating how I want the season to go," Lockett said. "I think that there's a lot of things I could have done this year — not knowing what I was doing — and done a lot better."

Lockett's potential can be seen in the progress he already has made this year. Every aspect of his game has improved, Snyder said.

"I think just being out there and doing it has helped him get better, and I think he's gotten better at catching the ball," he said. "I think he's gotten better with his level of confidence. He's gotten better at identifying at where the ball should go. He's learned to have a little bit more patience in order to pick his way as he goes."

"I think the whole gamut has, he's improved at all of it — every facet of returning punts."

The only skill Lockett doesn't exhibit, one completely out of his control, is the ability to break tackles due to his small size. Several times throughout the season, tacklers have slung the returner down by the shoulder pads or jersey, but Snyder is willing to accept that weakness. The tacklers still have to catch him first, he said.

"A fast-moving target is hard to get a solid shot on, and he understands that. His quickness and ability to change direction and speed allow him to temper the fact that somebody can blast him," Snyder said. "It's hard to get clean shots at a guy that has that kind of movement."

Aaron Lockett runs back an 83-yard punt return against Ball State. Lockett has filled in since David Allen was injured in the season-opener against Iowa.

Fund raising with

BIG TWANG

Story By Lynne Hermansen

Manhattan Arts Center site of show to benefit Habitat for Humanity

Bluegrass sounds will resonate throughout the Manhattan Arts Center this weekend for a good cause.

The Manhattan chapter of Habitat for Humanity will present its second benefit concert at 7 p.m. Saturday.

"Last year we had a benefit involving area church choirs," said Lee Grimes, executive director of Habitat for Humanity. "It was more Christmas and family-oriented, and we hope to expand and attract a wider crowd for this year. Hopefully, we can appeal to those who are different than the typical crowd, or perhaps do not celebrate Christmas."

This year's concert will be featuring the Wichita-based bluegrass/dixie group Big Twang.

"David Kamerer, one of the founders of BirdHouse, recommended them to us," Grimes said. "He is informed of Kansas artists and heard them play and said that he loved them and they were absolutely fantastic."

Kamerer said he recommended Big Twang because he is old friends with band member Ken White.

"We are good buddies, always jamming on the front porch," he said. "He is an amazing musician who has won all kinds of awards. It is always a pleasure to play with him."

Kamerer said he decided to follow the band, and has watched them perform several times.

"Robin Macy is a very accomplished and talented singer and musician," he said. "They are a very good ensemble who captures that old-time bluegrass feel."

Singer and guitarist Macy is the founding member of the country band Dixie Chicks. Big Twang also is composed of mandolin player White, banjo player Jeff Scroggins, guitarist Troy Gilchrist and bassist/songwriter Darren Wilcox.

The band won the prestigious 1999 Rocky Grass Band Championship.

Macy said their name originated from a band contest the group entered.

"We had to come up with a name on the spur of the moment," she said. "We are a collection of nerds, techies. Originally, we were the Big Twang Theory, but that was shortened later on."

She said the name also describes their music.

"Our sound is kind of twangy," she said. "We are an old band with a new twist, a Kansas twist. I would call us progressive, almost new grass. We are more contemporary."

Macy said she has known and played with three Big Twang's members for 20 years.

"Troy, Jeff and I have known each other for a long time," she said. "We originally met in Texas and ended up in Wichita."

She said they are excited about playing in Manhattan.

"We hardly ever leave our South Central Kansas location," she said. "It's great to be able to play this far from home."

Macy said their main shows have been in Wichita and the surrounding area.

"Young people like us, and so I'm hoping that by coming to a college town, we will continue to attract young people and gain some new ears," she said.

Macy also teaches math at an area Wichita school, and said she became involved with Habitat for Humanity because the school works with the organization.

"I knew of its virtue and seen the good things it has done," she said. "I also helped build houses here in Wichita with my students after the tornadoes rolled through. They are a deserving organization."

Grimes said she thinks Saturday is the perfect time to have the benefit concert.

"I think it is good timing after the Dixie Chicks concert, since Robin Macy is a former member," she said.

Grimes said it was not a problem asking Big Twang to perform for their concert.

"Robin Macy was thrilled," she said. "She is committed to such organizations and she has never performed in Manhattan before."

Grimes said she hopes the benefit concert will be a regular annual occurrence.

TICKETS

There is a general admission minimum donation of $10, but larger donations will be accepted. Tickets can be purchased at the Manhattan Habitat for Humanity Office or Streetside Records in Aggieville.

"This is a good time of year for people to think about how fortunate they are, and how they are able to give back to their community," she said.

Kamerer said he hopes a lot of people go to the concert.

"After all, it is for a good cause," he said.

Grimes said Habitat for Humanity depends on the generosity of the community.

"We receive our funding through the outside community," she said.

Habitat for Humanity builds two houses every spring, Grimes said.

"So, now in December is the time we need contributions," she said.

The concert is not only for raising funds, Grimes said, but for the community.

"It is a celebration of the generosity of others," she said.

Macy said she could see Big Twang returning to the Manhattan area if Saturday's performance is successful.

"Of course we will return," she said.

"It gives us a great opportunity to attract folks outside of the Wichita area who are interested in our style of music."

Area show to showcase holiday aspects

Variety of sights available at Wamego at Columbian Theatre's Christmas revue.

By ERIN SCHNEWEIS
Kansas State Collegian

If the lights and trees are not getting students into the spirit of the holiday season, there are alternatives. The Columbian Theatre in Wamego is presenting its holiday show, "Columbian Christmas: Scenes of the Season."

The concert will run Friday-Sunday as well as Dec. 15-17. Friday and Saturday performances are at 7:30 p.m.

and Sunday performances are at 2 p.m.

Scott Kickhafer, artistic director, said the show will offer a variety of holiday music.

"Basically, it's a musical revue that offers different perspectives on Christmas," Kickhafer said.

The show will look at the different aspects of the Christmas season, including everything from a TV show in California to a Midwestern family decorating their tree, and from a Broadway show rehearsal to the deep south, where a gospel choir is singing, he said. The gospel choir segment will be performed by JK-State's United Black Voices Gospel Choir.

Other K-State students also will be featured in the performance.

Choreographer and performer Courtney Pralle, senior in psychology and theater, has been putting a lot of time into the dance pieces.

"This is my first big performance," she said.

She received the script at the end of October and said she has been working on the dance numbers ever since.

"The biggest challenges would be choreographing the little things, for instance, the movements for the singers and the actors," she said.

Adapting to the different skills also has been a challenge Pralle said she has gladly accepted.

"It has been a challenge to work with various levels of dance ability," she said. "It's interesting to find a happy medium, something where everyone looks good."

Kickhafer said there are several reasons why everyone should attend, such as the music and the spirit of the season.

"It's just a good way to kick off the holiday season," he said.

Weekend successful for team

■ Regional ranking up thanks to high showings.

By STEVEN DEARINGER
Kansas State Collegian

K-State equestrian continued to improve in the standings this weekend in both Western and English.

"We had a really good weekend," Teresa Slough, equestrian coach, said. "Both teams moved up in the regional standings."

The English team is tied in Region 7 with Texas A&M with 131 points on the season, following its first place tie with Oklahoma State in Saturday morning's show in College Station, Texas, and placing fifth in the evening event.

Meanwhile, the Western team was reserve high-point team to Texas A&M in Sunday's morning show, while also tying Texas A&M in the evening event. This was the first time this season the Western team placed above West Texas A&M, who placed third and fourth in the two shows.

"We had an absolutely excellent weekend," said Kelly Gratny, junior English and Western rider. "We really stepped up on both teams. Texas A&M had a really good selection of horses, and that really helped."

It also was the first time West Texas A&M was not host to the Western competition this season. Being host to an event might give a team the advantage of riding some of the same horses ridden in practice, but West Texas A&M does have a really talented group of riders, Slough said.

However, the Cat coach said K-State has a talented group as well. Melissa Thompson, freshman English rider, was high-point rider Saturday evening, and Kelly Gratny was reserve high-point rider in Sunday evening's Western show.

"I had really lucky draws," Thompson said. "After the last show, we sat down with the coaches and went over what we needed to work on and it really made a difference."

Other Western riders that placed in the top three included Amber Everhart, Kara Nielsen, Angie Guglielmino, Sarah Pittenger, Megan Douthitt, Megan Hemberger, Stephanie Budde, Abby Oldridge and Marie Skolout.

Several English riders placed in the top three as well, including Kara Jagels, Gretchen Pfister, Lindsey Hill, Angie Guglielmino, Katie Griffin, Callie Smith, Kristy Rue, Karrie Clark and Erin Ferriter. The weekend meet concluded the fall competitions for both teams.

GIVING

The group raised $3,194 worth of toys during the bike ride and then had a poker run that evening that raised an additional $404 to be donated to Myers' and his giveaway.

"All the work is minimum when you see the great work that is done," Harrison said. "When the people come in to get their toys, they are all smiles with tears of thank-yous. It just breaks your heart to realize what a good thing Al is doing."

Myers said he tries to advertise when they will be open through newspapers, but it mainly is by word of mouth. He said when parents come to pick up the toys, there are no questions asked.

"I don't care who you are or where you come from," he said. "If you need toys, then you know it and you are more than welcome to come down and pick some out. We don't have any prerequisites on income or need, because some may be to proud to ask. We just have an open door policy with no questions asked."

The toy giveaway is based out of whatever building Myers can find during the holiday season.

"We are in the old Hardee's building in Aggieville this year," he said. "But we basically go anywhere we can find to put them. A few years we have been based out of our garage."

This year Myers will open the toy giveaway for two days, Saturday and Dec. 16 from 9 a.m. to whenever the toys are gone. In past years, Myers said he has been open for three days, but the stress is becoming too much.

"I am getting up there in age," he said. "I am almost 65 and I was only 23 when I started it, so some things have changed. It is getting to be an awful lot of stress, and on top of the stress, I have a little bit of a heart problem. It gets harder each year, but I am afraid to stop because I don't know what will happen to the program."

Myers said his wife, Clara, wants him to quit, but he is not ready to yet. "Who is going to do it if I don't?" he said. However, his wife has a different view.

"I love the toy drive and I love what my husband is doing, but him and his health means something to me too," Clara said. "The last few years, he has had to be in the hospital everytime the toy giveaway comes around. That is a little scary."

Clara said the stress is what causes her husband's bad health during the giveaway.

"I think that he has good people that stand behind him and help him with the program physically, but it is a lot of stress worrying about all the things," she said. "He is always worrying about how he will get the toys, where we will have the shop at and if we will have enough time."

Myers said a few more volunteers showed up this year, which was encouraging to him.

"Usually, it is just a few of us," he said. "But this year, you wouldn't believe it, eight people showed up to help. They came with trucks and were ready to work. I was so thrilled."

Myers said he has thought about passing the program on to others, but the time just doesn't seem right, yet.

"I am not ready to give it up," Myers said. "There are a lot of little things that go into that would be hard for someone new to take over. It took me a long time to learn the ropes."

His wife does agree with him on that point.

"I keep telling him he has had it so many years that maybe it is time to let another organization take over, but they don't run things the same way," Clara Myers said. "The problem is a lot of them only take cash or new toys and we take used toys. It helps us help more people that way. I guess we will just have to wait and see what happens. I just know what my husband does is great, but it is stressful. It is a worthwhile organization but I have to worry about him too because he means something to me also."

Can you pass this test on natural gas safety?

Here's what you and your family members need to know:

1. If you smell something like "rotten" eggs...

You may have a natural gas leak in your home. While natural gas is naturally colorless, odorless, and safe, we've added an unnatural scent to warn you of a gas presence in your home. If you think you might have a natural gas leak:

Leave the house immediately. Call
Kansas Gas Service:
1-800-794-4780

from a neighbor's phone. Don't flip a light switch, light a match or use your telephone ~ any of which can create a spark that can result in a fire.

2. If you feel frequent headaches, dizziness excessive perspiration, fatigue or nausea...

You may be suffering symptoms of carbon monoxide poisoning, the result of improper combustion in your gas furnace.

Leave the house immediately.
Call 911 from a neighbor's home and your local fire department will be there to test for carbon monoxide levels in your home.

Before you dig call:
1-800-DIG-SAFE
(1-800-344-7233)

Each day Kansas Gas Service delivers natural gas through a series of underground gas lines. If you plan to dig around your home, please call us at least two days in advance and trained personnel will mark your lines at no charge to you.

3. If you see a yellow furnace flame instead of a blue one...

It is a warning sign that your gas fuel is burning inefficiently...that means an increased potential for carbon monoxide poisoning and higher fuel bills.

Check all your gas appliances regularly to make certain the burner flame is blue.

Ask a qualified heating and cooling contractor to inspect your gas furnace annually. Don't block air intake areas near or around appliances. Clean or replace heating system air filters regularly. Check flue and chimney for proper ventilation.

GRADUATION

football players earn degrees, but tallied a higher national percentage of white football players at 57 percent.

Nevertheless, those K-State figures, when broken down into subgroups, are based on a sample of only six to 10 players in each category, said Phil Hughes, associate athletics director for student services.

In turn, people must understand that the statistics are very pliable, he said.

"I don't want to knock the numbers, but I get very concerned about what people take away from the percentages. To me it gets a little tricky," Hughes said.

"If you know the numbers, you don't get hung up on the sensationalism of the statistic, but without understanding the unrefined definition of the formula and without knowing the cell size of the population, where is the meaning?"

Additionally, Hughes said K-State has had several professional athletes who come back 10 years later and earn their diploma. Yet, they won't be reflected in any graduation rate survey by the NCAA, since those numbers are calculated only by the number of athletes that graduated within a six-year period.

Meanwhile, aside from athletics, K-State students overall who entered in '93 graduated at only a 52.1-percent clip, while the national norm was 58 percent.

However, graduation rates are expected to increase later in the decade, because starting this fall, K-State no longer will have open admissions. In turn, students wishing to attend the university must meet specific admission requirements.

According to the Office of Admissions, incoming freshmen must meet at least one of the following requirements: score a 21 or better on the ACT or a 990 on the SAT, rank in the top third of his/her graduating class or complete the precollege curriculum with a 2.0 cumulative grade point average (2.5 for out-of-state students).

In addition, transfer students with less than 24 hours of transfer work must meet one of the above criteria, have a 2.0 GPA, and those with over 24 credit hours must have at least a 2.0 GPA on their transfer work.

However, Mike Lynch, associate vice president of education and personal development, is not sure how much open admissions affected the graduation numbers from '93.

"It probably pays some, but the percentages there are a lot of students who would have met these admissions requirements that still won't graduate," Lynch said. "The majority of these 1993 freshmen would have qualified for admissions."

As far as pre-professional programs are concerned, though, Lynch said K-State is in the process of trying to implement a statewide tracking system, a task that's far easier said than done.

"The problem is, we have to use a federal definition that we use to file federal reports, and the NCAA does the same thing," Lynch said. "Unless we can document the transfer, we have to list them as a dropout."

If K-State could document such instances, it indirectly would help the graduation percentage to escalate, he said.

"Those students would come out of our base and, by default, that raises the graduation rate a little bit," Lynch said.

Overall, he said although rates are expected by many to increase over the years, one shouldn't expect them to skyrocket by any means.

"I don't think it's going to have as dramatic of an affect as other people think," Hughes said.

"Some children aren't ready to learn how to write their names," she said.

The children have to build the strength in their hands and coordination to even use a pencil. The center has the children do activities using clothes pins, which helps the children strengthen their fingers so they can grasp pencils.

The center's teachers let all the children learn at their own pace. Gentle coaxing replaces instruction. Children learn problem-solving skills through puzzles. Two-year-olds might only push a puzzle piece one way, but as they get older, they learn to turn the piece around until it fits into place.

"It is amazing how much they know and how much they learn by playing," Tara Mossa, preschool teacher, said.

They also want the children to develop their imaginations.

Decker said she strongly believes in reading to children at a young age because it helps build language and reading skills and stimulates the children's imaginations.

Imagination can bloom in art projects as well. A stack of construction paper later would be turned into turkeys at the center. Mossa said the children were going to be given free rein to put the turkeys together in any way they wanted, even if it meant a turkey with a eye in the middle of its head.

"If they want to draw someone with purple hair, then we let them have purple hair," she said. "That's how the child sees it."

Frames on the walls of Decker's preschool room contained self-portraits of the children. Some were red, brown, orange or purple scribbles.

The children's names and birthdays were on display on brightly colored party hats on one wall. Snowmen with their names on them designated the hooks for their coats, and mats on the floor with their names designated where they were supposed to sit for group activities.

In Mossa's room the tables were covered with the pictures of children from previous classes.

Children point to another child and say, "They have brown hair just like mine," Mossa said. "They are everywhere in the room," she said.

Socialization skills are so important, Allison said.

"They learn how to work together and play together," she said. "We teach collaboration from an early age."

Decker said the children build foundations in social skills they will use the rest of their lives.

Mossa was helping two children with their puzzles. One child was from the Middle East, as is Mossa, and was experiencing puzzles for the first time. A slightly older girl at his side was helping him put the pieces of the fish into place.

The children at the center have been helping the boy learn the routine. Another little girl earlier had helped the boy fold his blanket after naptime.

The teachers try to prevent problems with discipline occurring by separating children they think might not get along. They also use positive reinforcement, Decker said. If a child is exhibiting good behavior, a teacher will point it out.

If problems occur like a disagreement over sharing toys, the teachers try to redirect the children. A teacher might try to get the child to play with another toy. Time out is a last resort.

"We try not to have a lot of no, no, no," Mossa said. "Instead of saying, 'No running,' we would say, 'Use your walking feet please.'"

K-State's Jonathan Beasley is pulled down by Iowa's Mike Dolezal as he tries to break through the line during the Eddie Robinson Classic at Arrowhead Stadium in Kansas City, Mo. KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

K-State downs Iowa in K.C.

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — "I'd think twice about playing it again."

That was head football coach Bill Snyder's reaction to K-State's 27-7 victory over Iowa on Aug. 26 in the fourth annual Eddie Robinson Classic at Arrowhead Stadium.

"I don't think we were ready — that's poor coaching," Snyder said after the game. "It's been a long time since we've played this early a ball game. I need to reassess how we did it, and it's my responsibility to prepare our football team."

Snyder said that lack of preparation was evident in the Cat win, although there were many positives to be taken from the ball game.

For instance, K-State (1-0) took its opening drive of the 2000 season 68 yards in five plays, capped by a one-yard touchdown run by tailback David Allen.

After the Cat defense kept Iowa (0-1) to a three-and-out on the ensuing possession, Hawkeye punter Jason Baker angled a kick to Allen at the K-State 14-yard line. The senior took the ball and raced 86 yards for a touchdown, seemingly breaking the NCAA record with his 8th career punt return for a touchdown.

But it was called back.

K-State was called for an illegal block in the back penalty, negating the touchdown and pinning the Cats back to their own 8-yard line.

"It was beyond disappointing — I was visibly angry," Snyder said of the ordeal. "That is kind of a precarious specialty teams unit, and to play on it, there's got to be a discipline that probably transcends all of football."

Following the penalty, K-State drove 79 yards in 11 plays to extend the lead to 10-0 on a 24-yard field goal by senior Jamie Rheem.

The Cats would score once more in the first half on senior wide-out Quincy Morgan's 4-yard touchdown with just 19 seconds before the intermission.

However, a different Iowa team came out of the locker room in the second half against the Cats.

"They had a little period in the third quarter where they started getting some momentum and their crowd got back in it and everything," senior defensive end Chris Johnson said.

That momentum culminated on K-State's mistakes.

In the Cats' second possession of the half, an Allen fumble led to a six-play, 43-yard Iowa scoring drive, its first of the game, that cut the K-State lead to 17-7.

The Hawkeyes then caused turnovers on K-State's next two possessions, both on Beasley interceptions, but the Cat defense kept Iowa from capitalizing.

Then the K-State offense went to work, adding two more scoring drives in the fourth quarter to seal the victory over the Hawkeyes.

Improvement visible in win over Bulldogs

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN — The word improvement came to mind when head coach Bill Snyder analyzed K-State's 54-10 victory over Louisiana Tech on Sept. 2.

"By and large, we have improved from the first game (against Iowa)," Snyder said. "We are a better football team today than we were last week. Collectively, we are a better football team."

That betterment stemmed from the Wildcats' execution on both sides of the football, despite the excruciating on-the-field temperatures, which registered at 109 degrees at kick-off with a 127-degree heat index on the playing surface.

Offensively, K-State (2-0) racked up 500 yards of total offense on Louisiana Tech (1-1), 233 through the air and 267 on the ground, with 123 of those rushing yards coming from fifth-year senior Chris Claybon.

"When it came time to run, we were able to run, and when it was time to pass, we completed some passes," senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley said after the game. "So, it was 50-50 — both complimented each other."

Beasley went 13-for-22 passing and tossed three touchdowns in engineering the Cat aerial attack.

"They have a lot of big play capabilities," Tech head coach Jack Bicknell said. "If you let Beasley out of the pocket, it's all over. The guy is so accurate out of the pocket, it's unbelievable."

"It just seems like it was a game of big plays for them and turnovers for us."

Those turnovers came frequently for the Bulldog offense, with five to be exact — four interceptions and one lost fumble.

Butler claimed two of the team's

Despite Stallworth attempting nearly 50 passes for the game, the Wildcat secondary limited the junior to 29 completions for 264 yards and one touchdown.

"The way their offense is, they're going to get yards," Butler said. "That's all there is to it. We've just got to try to limit the amount of points they get."

And limit Tech's points they did, keeping the Bulldogs to 10 for the game. Meanwhile, K-State's offense was in full swing, scoring on all six opportunities in the first half.

That showing continued after the intermission, as Beasley tossed two more TD strikes.

Records fall in Cat win

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN — K-State's 76-0 romp over Ball State was a hard game to coach for the Wildcats' Bill Snyder.

"I've been there, and I understand the other side," he said after the contest. "That's hard for those other youngsters in that locker room. All they want is just a little bit of light at the end of the tunnel, and it's hard for them to see it that way."

That difficulty continued to escalate, as the Wildcats' Sept. 16 win over the Cardinals at KSU Stadium extended their losing streak to 20 games.

"Your fans are going to be after you under any circumstances if you don't win or if you have a bad ball game, as took place," Snyder said. "I guess there's a compassionate side of coaching, and I think I'm not alone in that. I think most coaches are probably that way."

That compassion was evident as Snyder paid a visit to the Ball State locker room following the Cats' lopsided victory. He could relate to Cardinal head coach Bill Lynch and the feelings on the opposing sideline.

"I told him I've been where he is," Snyder said to Lynch. "Our football program has been where his is. I believe that he had a plan that was doable, and I encouraged him to stick with it — I didn't tell him anything he didn't know."

That encouragement was directed to Lynch's team as well.

"I told his players I appreciated the fact that I didn't see — and I paid attention to it — I didn't see anybody out there that tried to give up."

"They will break their streak, and eventually that program will become a good program again, and as I said, I've been there."

However, Snyder is far from there now. In fact, K-State (3-0) is the No. 4 team in the nation, according to the Associated Press poll.

In addition, the squad's 76 points against Ball State (0-3) is the most ever in Wildcat football history, dating back to a 75-5 drubbing of Drury on Oct. 17, 1910, under then-head coach Mike Ahearn.

"I thought we were a good football team tonight," Snyder said. "I thought we played well in the first half of the ball game and I was pleased that our two's and three's and four's played well for the most part in the second half."

"Collectively, I think we were a better football team tonight than

we have been at any time during the course of the season, so we are making some improvement."

Yet, Snyder said the Cats' 76-point margin of victory doesn't indicate that his team sits a certain level above Ball State.

"We were not that much better than that football team," he said. "We did play well tonight, and I wanted (Lynch's) team to know that they played an awfully good football team."

And play a good team they did.

K-State, for the second consecutive game, racked up more than 500 yards of total offense, with 343 coming in the first half alone.

"We're heading in the right direction," offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said. "A lot of that is relative to the opponents we're playing, you know that as well as I do."

"But if you had to look at it from the outside looking in, we were very pleased with the way things are going right now — we're not turning the ball over."

Instead, the Cats spent much of their Saturday turning possessions into points.

On their opening drive, senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley, engineering the Cats' no huddle offense, connected with senior wide receiver Quincy Morgan for 55 yards to give K-State a 6-0 lead.

That TD marked the beginning of 10 consecutive Wildcat scoring drives for touchdowns, which lasted until the 11:28 juncture in the fourth quarter.

K-State's offense found the end zone four times in the first quarter alone and was complemented by an 83-yard punt return for touchdown by junior Aaron Lockett, which gave the Cats a 34-0 lead.

Early and often

With 34 points in the first quarter, the Wildcats posted the second most points in a quarter in school history. K-State also tallied 34 points against Northern Illinois on Sept. 12, 1998, and the total is second only to 35 points set Nov. 20, 1999, against Missouri. The Cats' 48 points in the first half was also the second most points scored in a half in program history, behind the 59 points against Northern Illinois in '98.

Shattering records

K-State set the school record for most touchdowns in a game with 11 against the Cardinals, as well as most points in a game with 76 (one point off the Big 12 record set by Nebraska versus Iowa State in 1997).

Struggles overshadow North Texas victory

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN — Head coach Bill Snyder said before playing North Texas on Sept. 23 that it would be a much different game than the Cats' previous contest against Ball State.

He turned out to be right.

Against the Cardinals, everything that K-State tried succeeded, but the same didn't hold true against North Texas (0-4), even though the Cats (4-0) won 55-10, Snyder said.

"There were certain areas that we weren't very good at, things that need to be corrected," Snyder said after the game. "Above all, I'm concerned about just the discipline of doing things right, regardless of what the circumstances might be."

That lack of discipline was evident in nearly all areas of the game, but especially in the team's nine penalties for 77 yards, Snyder said.

"We were penalized far too much," he said. "That's a discipline thing as much as anything else."

However, Snyder said his disappointment extended beyond penalties, as the play of the second string on both sides of the ball left something to be desired.

"We put some No. 2's in the ball game, and they didn't hold up their end of the bargain — really on both sides," he said.

By not performing to their capabilities, the second string players allowed North Texas to nearly double their offensive output. The Mean Green ended up with 138 net yards, 66 of which came on one play in the fourth quarter, Snyder said.

"We get our No. 2's on the field, and we get a safety that gets flat run over from his toes to the tip of his head," Snyder said. "You take that away, and they're looking at maybe 50 yards of total offense."

Also making their mark on the list of disappointments were the special teams, especially kickoffs, Snyder said. With the wind in his face, placekicker Jared Britt couldn't punch the ball past the 15-yard line.

"I'd hate to tell you where we were trying to kick it," Snyder said. "He hasn't hit where we wanted to yet."

Poor kickoffs, however, were just one of many mistakes made

"I thought we kind of stunk the place up really," Snyder said. "I don't think we were very good outside of blocking a couple punts. Coverage was a little sporadic on our kickoff unit. Our punt team was dead in the rear."

The struggles weren't the result of the cold, rainy weather, either, Snyder said.

"Weather doesn't have anything to do with it. Either you play or you can't," he said.

Special teams might have faltered, but K-State did immediately take control of the game with two blocked punts in the first quarter, one by Brice Libel and the other by Chris Claybon. The result was a mental advantage for the Cats, Claybon said.

"Football's a field position game and on fourth down you at least expect to get the ball out of your own end," he said. "A blocked punt is pretty demoralizing, and it affects the whole team's mentality."

One similarity between the Ball State and North Texas games, though, was the defense's ability to shut down the opponent's passing game. Ball State eked out five yards, and North Texas only could muster 35 though the air.

"I don't think there's much more we can do on our passing defense," Leber said. "We've got great interior lineman doing their job — getting in the quarterback's face."

K-State tops Colorado in Big 12 road opener

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

BOULDER, Colo. — The final statistics of the K-State/Colorado game were relatively close. The score wasn't.

Despite edging the Buffaloes by only 42 yards of total offense, the fourth-ranked Wildcats (5-0) opened Big 12 Conference play Sept. 30 with a 44-21 victory over Colorado (0-4) on national television, the most points ever scored by a Wildcat team against CU.

However, after playing a much-criticized non-conference schedule, whether the win silenced K-State's national critics remained uncertain.

"If they knock us, they have to knock Colorado, and they have to knock the teams that played Colorado," senior wide-out Aaron Lockett said. "It's hard to judge us compared to teams that played Colorado, but I think we came out on ABC and made somewhat of a statement."

However, head coach Bill Snyder wasn't so quick to agree.

"I don't know if we've proven anything," he said. "We're a 5-0 football team, and that's about all I can say about us right now."

Regardless, K-State defeated Colorado in its road opener, a tough task amid the tumultuous sell-out crowd at Folsom Field.

"It's rough — the fans are on your back 24-7," he said after the game. "It definitely is a field where there is a lot of tradition. I think you notice that when you play against a team like Colorado."

The Cats overcame that element with the help of more than 6,000 K-State fans who made

"I think it was a great feeling for us," Lockett said. "We came out and felt like we were in Manhattan right there from the start."

In fact, much of K-State's play, especially Lockett's, reflected that of previous wins at KSU Stadium this season.

The 5-foot-7, Tulsa, Okla., native's 49-yard punt return and 55-yard pass reception both led to touchdowns on the Cats' first two possessions, opening up a 13-0 lead.

However, Lockett might have sealed CU's fate after adding another score eleven seconds before the end of the first half.

K-State takes 8th straight from in-state rival Kansas

By DEREK BOSS

LAWRENCE — As the Wildcats made their victory lap around Memorial Stadium on Oct. 7, they had plenty to be smiling about.

K-State had just stomped in-state rival Kansas 52-13 on their home turf, improved to an undefeated 6-0 record on the season and 2-0 in the Big 12 and secured their eighth consecutive victory over the Jayhawks (2-3, 0-2) in the series.

Not to mention, with Florida State's 27-24 loss to Miami, the Cat victory moved them to No. 2 in the Associated Press poll and No. 3 in the USA/Today Coaches poll.

Despite the superlatives, it was just another win for the Wildcats, said senior quarterback and Heisman Trophy nominee Jonathan Beasley.

"Just winning the game is more important for me than how much we're winning by," he said. "Offense, defense and special teams did a great job — and that's just the bottom line." It was the second quarter that blew the game wide open.

MANHATTAN — It was a loss that ranked near the top of the list for linebacker Ben Leber.

"It's a lot of heartache. It's a tough loss to take, and we worked so hard and invested so much time and effort into it," the junior captain said. "Anytime you do that and it doesn't come out in your favor, it's always kind of tough to take."

And difficult it was, as Oklahoma (6-0, 3-0) and a quartet of former K-State coaches stormed into KSU Stadium on Oct. 14 and knocked off the Wildcats (6-1, 2-1), 41-31.

Amid the hype of ABC Sports and ESPN "College Gameday" on Oct. 14 in Manhattan, head coach Bill Snyder said he gives OU credit.

"Take nothing away from Oklahoma. They indeed were the best team this afternoon," he said, "but I'm not content that we played very well."

That perception, in part, stems from the Cats' uncharacteristic play on both sides of the football, strong safety Jarrod Cooper said, but that's an element that can't be dwelled upon.

"You've got to take everything positive or you're a crybaby," the senior captain said. "We dropped some balls, we missed some tackles — 'Hey, don't do it next time,' that's all you can say."

In fact, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said he can't remember poorer tackling by his Wildcat unit. Even Snyder reiterated the importance of wrapping up, an issue that's been discussed from the very beginning.

"Since the halftime of the Iowa game, we've addressed that," Snyder said. "Great defensive football teams are great tackling teams — you've all heard that nomenclature — and that's pretty accurate. We're not a very good tackling football team."

K-State bounces back to hold off Tech

By DEREK BOSS

MANHATTAN — Two consecutive weeks. Two similar football teams. Two different outcomes.

That was the scenario for K-State's Oct. 21 matchup with Texas Tech, the first game following the Cats' 41-31 loss to Oklahoma.

Despite schematic likenesses of the Sooners and Red Raiders, though, the results failed to correlate, as K-State (7-1, 3-1) prevailed 28-23 over Texas Tech (5-3, 1-3).

It didn't come easy, but it was a win the Cats needed, linebacker Ben Leber said.

"We came out facing the same type of offense and the same type of defense and got a win," he said.

"That's great for our confidence and great for everything. It was a big challenge put on us, not only internally, but externally by the media and everybody else, so we just wanted to come out with the 'W.'" The Cats' achieved a win, but not by much.

"Today, we played well enough to win," Snyder said after the game, "but we didn't play like we're capable of."

However, it wasn't as if the Red Raiders were a mediocre opponent, senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper said.

"Texas Tech is a good football team, pound for pound. Any team that overlooks Texas Tech has something coming to them," he said.

Consequently, K-State's win was important, even though the Cats failed to match the 56-3 shellacking Nebraska handed the Red Raiders the previous week in Lubbock, Snyder said.

"We're not a 'Nebraska' on offense, and that ball game got out of hand very quickly. An interception and they run it in the end zone, then two quick scores after that, and it kind of snowballed," he said. "I think, by and large, this is a good Texas Tech defense."

And Tech proved that Saturday as they kept K-State, the No. 1 scoring offense in the nation, to 28 points and only 285 yards of total offense.

In the end, it was a special teams play that ignited the Wildcats.

With K-State leading 14-9 midway through the third quarter, Tech was faced with a fourth-and-25 from their own 26-yard line.

Senior Brice Libel broke through the Red Raider punt team unit to block the kick, the fourth of his career, and give the Cats possession deep in Tech territory.

K-State needed only two plays to capitalize, scoring on a 15-yard TD run by fullback Rock Cartwright to extend its lead to 21-9.

Tech countered to cut its deficit to five, but Cat cornerback Dyshod Carter's interception late in the game led to a Cat touchdown and a 28-16 lead with 3:52 to play.

That TD would prove important, though, considering QB Kliff Kingsbury led the Red Raiders on a 79-yard scoring drive with 0:31 remaining to slice the lead to 28-23.

'Wrecking Crew' stymies Cat offensive attack

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

COLLEGE STATION, Texas — K-State seemed to have two left feet in its Oct. 30 dance with Texas A&M.

Despite gaining more offensive yards than the Aggies (6-2, 4-1), the Wildcats (7-2, 3-2) were unable to match A&M's scoring output when it counted, losing the game 26-10.

The swarming Aggie defense, known as the "Wrecking Crew," showed their typical prowess at Kyle Field, keeping K-State's offense guessing and giving up 126 yards and no points in the first half.

Senior quarterback Jonathan Beasley was picked off twice in the first 30 minutes, completing just 5-of-15 passing for 61 yards.

Junior tailback Josh Scobey also ran eight times for just 36 yards in the first half.

Head coach Bill Snyder said he felt frustrated and dejected as he made his way to the locker room down 19-0 at halftime, looking for answers to an A&M defense that stalled his team's five first half drives, forcing three punts and nabbing two interceptions.

"We'd get a play here and a play there and a first down here, but we just couldn't put anything together," Snyder said. "That was the story of the first half."

Conversely, A&M found consistency early and often in the first half behind fullback Ja'Mar Toombs, who established season-highs in both rushing yards (89) and touchdowns (3).

Toombs entered the game averaging just 14.3 yards per game, but took advantage of the Wildcats' weak tackling, rumbling for 59 yards in the first half.

"Toombs is a good back, but we just tackled too high," junior linebacker Ben Leber said. "He was tough — they kept throwing stuff at us that kept us off guard."

Aggie head coach R.C. Slocum was pleased with his team's combined 98 yards rushing in the first half, but said Toombs' contribution wasn't a surprise.

"Ja'Mar is a good football player," Slocum said. "He makes things happen and gets extra yards on most of his runs. I thought we needed balance on offense — the line did a good job of getting movement and the backs ran hard."

A&M offensive coordinator Steve Kragthorpe said he also was confident in Toombs' ability to produce. "He told me that he would get the job done, so I saddled him and rode him off into the sunset," Kragthorpe said with a smile.

The Cat defense would answer, though, as the Cats held the Aggies to three-and-outs on each of the their first four possessions of the second half, holding A&M scoreless in the third quarter.

However, K-State could only capitalize with 10 points, a 31-yard touchdown pass from Beasley to Aaron Lockett and a 22-yard Jamie Rheem field goal.

That momentum was dashed as A&M added a touchdown with 10:21 to play in the game following a Wes Bautovich interception, putting the nail in the Wildcats' coffin.

With two losses in the Big 12, Snyder said K-State now must focus on the team's remaining three games, knowing that the possibility of a conference championship is still within reach.

"We just realize that we still have a chance to do some of the things that we'd like to do," he said.

Cats regain confidence with Iowa State win

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

MANHATTAN — Head coach Bill Snyder admits regaining full confidence is no easy task.

With the losses to Oklahoma and Texas A&M this season, the Cats' field general said his team might not have had complete contingency and assurance within themselves.

But it was enough to win Nov. 4, as Snyder's No. 16/11 Wildcats (8-2, 4-2) trounced unranked Iowa State (6-3, 3-3) 56-10 at KSU Stadium.

"I couldn't honestly tell you that everybody in our program was at full confidence. Was anybody beyond the brink? Obviously, the answer to the question is no," Snyder said.

"And sometimes you look at confidence, and I think sometimes it can be confused with some other things — with tremendous disappointment, the anger, the adverse situations of losing a couple of ball games when you're really unaccustomed to doing that.

"Expectations for these young people were so extremely high, and not just on the outside, but within as well. I'm not telling you that everybody was still bubbling over with confidence — that probably wasn't the case — but I think it was probably a mixture of those things as much as anything. And for some people, one might be confused with the other."

That confusion bothered wide-out Quincy Morgan, as he said far too many people were doubting the Cats after losses to the Sooners and Aggies.

"Even though we lost, we knew our season wasn't over," he said after the Iowa State win. "A lot of people thought that we cashed it in, but that's not the case. We're still going to come out and play hard K-State football."

However, Snyder said shaken confidence was never an issue for him personally.

"Listen, I've been shot at and hit with every bullet out there," he said, "so I've been here before — been here and done that."

And the Cats looked as if they had been there and done that as well, jumping out to an early lead against the Cyclones.

K-State marched 67 yards in seven plays on its opening drive, capped by Josh Scobey's TD plunge from 2-yards out.

That score was possible thanks to a key third-down conversion, Snyder said. On third-and-10 from the Cats' 33-yard line, quarterback Jonathan Beasley scrambled to elude Cyclone pressure and found Rock Cartwright on the sideline for 21 yards.

"That could be as big of a play as there was in the ball game. At least that was in our favor," Snyder said.

"We finished the drive with seven points, and if you don't get that catch or don't get that throw, then you don't have those points."

"How does that impact the second drive? No one knows. But after you get seven on the first one, it makes it a little easier on the second one."

Apparently, it was easier.

After a Carl Gomez 30-yard field goal for the Cyclones, Scobey finished K-State's next drive, covering 64 yards in four plays, by pummeling in for a one-yard TD and giving the Cats a 14-3 lead.

Scobey added another rushing score with 1:21 remaining to make K-State a perfect 3-for-3 on scoring drives in the first quarter, two more Cat TD's in the second stanza as K-State led 35-3 at halftime, a lead they would extend to 56-10 by the game's end.

Nevertheless, Snyder was unsure whether the victory was, in fact, the cure to the Cats' ailments the past three weeks.

"Well, it's better than what the alternatives are, I assure you that," he said. "I was pleased with the way our youngsters played most of the ball game, particularly the way they got themselves on the field in the first half."

That success came at no surprise to Iowa State head coach Dan McCarney, however.

"Other than one week, they've been in the top 10 all season long and they sure looked like it today," he said. "They pretty much had their way with Iowa State."

Red Sea turned purple in Cat victory

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

The Red Sea parted once more. For the second time in the past three seasons, K-State did what was once the unthinkable — beat Nebraska.

On Senior Day, Nov. 11, amid a snow-covered field at KSU Stadium, the Wildcats (9-2, 5-2) topped the Cornhuskers (8-2, 5-2), 29-28.

"It was just absolutely amazing. I really don't even know how to express it, because it means so much to go out like this on your home field," senior Brice Libel said. "And the weather — the weather was just beautiful — it was so fitting."

And like the Cats' 40-30 win over

Nebraska in 1998, the goal posts came down — or the right upright at least.

As the waning seconds ticked off the clock, the record-crowd of 53,811 rushed the field to join the players in celebration, while managing to take a piece of the north end goal post with them to Aggieville.

Apparently, they were trying to take senior strong safety Jarrod Cooper along as well.

"They were picking me up, and I was like, 'all right, you're going to make me slip and fall and I'm going to get hurt, and there goes the rest of my life,'" Cooper said.

But undoubtedly, the win was a big one for the senior class, defensive end Monty Beisel said.

"Beating them two out of the last three years is huge. It's a big feather in the cap for the seniors," he said. "The last home game of your senior season, and there's no better way to go out."

"One point over Nebraska and the fans rushing the field — it's just crazy. It's something that's going to be cherished for a lifetime, and it's something we'll definitely look back on."

Even more special was the fact that the Huskers were favored by four to defeat the Cats, junior linebacker Ben Leber said.

"With everybody counting us down and out, it was even sweeter. I loved to see in the newspaper that we were predicted to lose, and a lot of people are picking us to lose — that's what I wanted, I wanted to be the underdog," he said. "I wanted to show everybody that we could overcome adversity and conditions like this. It made it just that much sweeter."

Sweet it was, Cooper said, as the victory ranks as one of the most memorable of his career.

"It was pretty emotional. I loved it — every last second," he said. "From the minute I woke up this morning at 6:32 (a.m.) to Monday at five o'clock, it's going to be great — probably one of the most special moments in the history of my game."

But not to say K-State's football program has finally climbed the mountain against Nebraska. The Cats did that two years ago in Manhattan, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"We've been here before. We've done this before," he said.

And like the 1998 win, a fourth quarter comeback was in the making. However, it wasn't Michael Bishop to provide the heroics — it was senior QB Jonathan Beasley.

The clock read 6:06 left in the fourth quarter. NU 28, K-State 23.

The Huskers had taken the lead on back-to-back TD runs by I-back Dan Alexander, and the Wildcats needed a late drive.

With the ball at their own 38-yard line, Beasley led the K-State offense into the NU red zone.

Second and goal: 12-yard line. Beasley dropped back in the pocket and hit wide-out Quincy Morgan on a crossing route for the go-ahead touchdown. K-State 29, Nebraska 28.

"I think it was a statement drive for this team," Beasley said, "knowing our backs were against the wall. Nebraska scored two big touchdowns against us, and we came back and had a drive like that."

"Nebraska's a great team and they're physical, and we were able to take those hits and come out with the knockout punch when it counted."

But after the Cats' two-point conversion attempt failed, and with 2:52 left to play, the K-State defense would need to hold.

"I had my hands in the hand warmer, and I was just saying, 'come on defense, stop 'em,'" Beasley said. "Everyone else was jumpin' around, but I was like, 'man, just do it defense and get us the ball back and we'll run the clock out.'"

That they did, and history was made once more, as K-State downed NU for just the second time in 32 years.

Mizzou game similar to '98

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

COLUMBIA, Mo. — Nov. 18, 2000, was 1998 all over again.

Two years ago, K-State took an emotional 40-30 victory over Nebraska to Memorial Stadium/Faurot Field, only to claim a narrow 31-25 victory.

Not much was different against Missouri this season.

Following the Wildcats' 29-28 come-from-behind win over the Cornhuskers, K-State again took the road to Columbia. This time, the winning margin was less than six, as the Cats triumphed 28-24 in front of 49,277.

In fact, left guard Andy Eby won't deny the similarities between the two seasons.

"It reminds you a lot of the '98 year," he said Saturday. "We were getting ready to play for a big conference championship and we had to come through Missouri and they played us real tough. It's pretty much the same thing that happened two years ago."

Yet part of that result can be attributed to things players are unable to control, head coach Bill Snyder said.

"There are subconscious things that take place in the human psyche, and sometimes those are things that maybe we don't have as much control over as we'd like to think that we do," he said. "And wherever that takes us, I don't know, but I believe that our players were trying desperately not to overlook a football team, not to take a football team for granted, not to take their own personal performance for granted — but it happened."

That doesn't go to say the K-State players weren't excited to face Missouri, Snyder said, as a win would clinch the Cats a berth in the 2000 Big 12 Championship game.

"I don't believe and I don't think that our players were any less motivated," he said. "I don't believe that there was that feeling that said, 'This is the University of Missouri, a 3-7 football team.' I believe that they fought against that, I honestly do. I think it goes deeper than that, to be honest with you."

Offensive coordinator Ron Hudson said he agreed, and said after the big win over Nebraska, it might have been difficult for some players to not overlook Missouri.

"I think human nature, being a youngster, you probably might have, but that's no reason why we struggled like we did," Hudson said. "It goes to show you that you can lose a game anytime, anywhere, and we almost did this weekend."

Still, that near-loss to the Tigers can't be accredited to a lack of effort on K-State's part, Snyder said.

"I would question how well we prepared. Our players play with effort, and I believe that we played with effort today," he said after the game. "I think the University of Missouri played very well. Believe me, they were well prepared — they played hard and deserved a great deal of the credit for creating some of the problems for us that existed today."

One also might attribute those problems to an emotional hangover from the NU win, although Eby wasn't sure if that was the case.

"I don't know. For some reason they play us hard at their house, so we had to come in and win the fourth quarter, and I think that was big for us," he said.

Win the fourth quarter, K-State did.

Leading 25-24, placekicker Jamie Rheem scored the only points in the final frame, a 34-yard field goal to extend the lead to four with 12:38 to play. The Cat defense, as well as the officials, then would thwart any hope of a Mizzou comeback.

The Tigers' last possession of the game ended on a Dyshod Carter interception in front of the Missouri bench with just 2:50 remaining, but Mizzou's hopes weren't completely dashed until one minute later.

After the Tiger defense kept K-State to a three-and-out, punter Travis Brown was prepared to kick the ball back to Missouri, giving them one final chance to drive.

Jarrod Copper tackles Zack Abrom in second-quarter action of K-State's victory over Missouri on Nov. 18 in Columbia.

As Brown's kick sailed through the end zone for a touchback, though, the officiating crew called a holding penalty on the Tigers, giving K-State an automatic first down. Mizzou had no timeouts remaining, so the Cats ran out the clock and claimed the 28-24 victory, as well as a berth in the Dr Pepper Big 12 Championship game, Dec. 2.

K-State's Big 12 title hopes dashed by OU

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — So much for not being able to beat a team twice in the same season.

In Saturday night's Big 12 Championship, top-ranked Oklahoma (12-0) did just that, edging out No. 7/8 K-State (10-3) 27-24 in front of a record-crowd of 79,655 at Arrowhead Stadium.

"My heart just broke," senior cornerback Dyshod Carter said. "I thought we had the game won early on, and then when you see the quarterback take a kneel down, you know it's not for you — it's for their benefit. It just hurt. It hurt the whole team."

It wasn't the only time the Sooners have inflicted pain on the Cats this season, either. On Oct. 14, Oklahoma spoiled K-State's undefeated 6-0 record with a 41-31 win in Manhattan.

However, head coach Bill Snyder's initial response to the game was quite brief.

"Well, I don't have very much to say. Obviously, we didn't play well enough to win the ball game," he said. "I wish Oklahoma the very best of good fortune, and I hope they win a national championship for the Big 12 Conference."

"They're an excellent football team, and we just weren't good enough on this given night to make a difference in the ball game."

One big difference came on the first play of the fourth quarter, with the score knotted at 17. OU faced a 4th-and-1 from K-State's 39-yard line, when quarterback Josh Heupel ran option left and pitched the ball to tailback Quentin Griffin, who scooted down the sideline for 22 yards. The play set up Heupel's 17-yard TD strike to wide-out Andre Woolfolk, giving the Sooners a 24-17 lead with 14:24 to play.

Snyder said the play isn't surprising to him in retrospect, but may have been at the time.

"That was a nice call," he said. "We were there to try to stop the sneak, and obviously you can't do that and stop the option both — and we didn't. So it was a chess match and a guessing game, and we didn't guess correctly."

Nevertheless, defensive coordinator Phil Bennett said the defense was prepared for any situation, but strong safety Jon McGraw's injury may have been the Cats' demise, as the junior couldn't fight off the block of OU fullback Seth Littrell, which sprung Griffin.

"Bless Jon McGraw's heart — he was doing everything he could, but he couldn't use his right arm," Bennett said. "Just with his experience, he wanted to play and I wanted to play him, and it probably wasn't a good decision. I thought, at that point, we could have stopped that play.

"No doubt, that was a back-breaker."

It was a call offensive coordinator Mark Mangino had been wanting to make all year.

"We've worked on the option since last spring, and we've dabbled with it a couple times in goal line, but we've never ran it out on the field. And I wanted to do it, wanted to do it, but I was always hesitant because I didn't want Josh to take a shot by a defensive end," Mangino said Saturday.

"But, you know, the last few weeks he's run so well with the ball that I felt if there's ever a night where we needed to use the option, it would be tonight because Kansas State, in short yardage situations, just loads the box up. It turned out to be an excellent play."

An excellent play it was, and when the Cats regained possession, the Sooner defense took control by stalling K-State's next three offensive drives, two of which were three-and-outs.

OU then added a 46-yard field goal by Tim Duncan to extend the lead to 10 with 1:25 to play, but the Cats countered. Quarterback Jonathan Beasley marched K-State down the field, finding wide-out Quincy Morgan in the end zone from 16 yards out to cut the lead to 27-24, but it was too late, as only six seconds remained on the clock.

At any rate, though, Carter said playing the No. 1 team in the nation down to the wire probably won't silence K-State's critics.

"We win, we lose, there's always going to be some negative criticism out there," he said. "Until you win

Nonetheless, Carter said he hopes this year's senior class legacy will be highlighted by one recurring element.

"That we came out each week and we played hard," he said. "We gave it our all, and we're K-State 'till we die."

K-State gets 2nd chance in Dallas

By DEREK BOSS

Kansas State Collegian

K-State might have failed to capitalize on its second chances Saturday, but the Wildcats will seek redemption once more come Jan. 1, 2001.

After its second defeat to Oklahoma this season, as well as its second loss in a Big 12 Championship game, K-State will attempt to reverse its New Year's Day fortunes, as the Cats are set to compete in the 65th annual Southwestern Bell Cotton Bowl Classic.

After falling to Brigham Young 19-15 in the 1997 Cotton Bowl, No. 11/9 K-State (10-3), the Big 12 North Division Champions, will meet head coach Phil Fulmer and No. 21 Tennessee (8-3) of the Southeastern Conference at 10 a.m. CST on Fox.

"We appreciate every bowl that's in existence and we've played in quite a few, as Tennessee has," head coach Bill Snyder said Sunday. "All bowls are very positive experiences for young people, but there is a special uniqueness about playing on New Year's Day."

"The tradition of it, I think, dates back almost throughout time, and players have grown up with that."

Fred McClure, chairman of the Cotton Bowl Athletic Association, said he's extremely excited about this year's bowl game.

"We're putting two teams together that have never played each other, and I think that's going to make it a great, wonderful experience for us here in Dallas, Texas, and, hopefully, for the many fans of Kansas State University and the University of Tennessee," he said.

Max Urlick, K-State director of athletics, said he feels honored for K-State and its football squad to receive an invitation to the Cotton Bowl, but he also sees the quality of opponent as a definite positive.

"I think the excitement of playing Tennessee will give an added spark to our fans and play a team that distincts itself over time with a long and storied tradition," Urlick said. "The football heroes and legends that have come out of Tennessee is really kind of a bonus for all our people to become better acquainted with."

The Volunteers will be making their 12th consecutive bowl appearance, a streak that began at the Cotton Bowl in 1990 against Arkansas, while Jan. 1 will mark K-State's eighth straight bowl trip.

Baker said he thinks this year's Cotton Bowl is the best matchup outside the four games in the Bowl Championship Series.

"I can't imagine a better matchup in terms of how they match up from a team perspective and the success that the programs have had in the '90s," Baker said.

COTTON BOWL FACTS

The Cotton Bowl, which houses 68,252, was erected in 1994 for the World Cup. The grass field was resodded in 1997, and only two games are played on it each year other than the bowl game — the Texas/Oklahoma matchup, and a Grambling game during the Texas State Fair.

The average temperature for the bowl game is 57 degrees, although the last two years it was a humid 71 and 68, respectively, at kickoff.

Payout for the game is $2.5 million per team.

Besides, the Wildcat players are excited no matter what bowl game they attend, senior cornerback Dyshod Carter said.

"It's always sweet. You have a bowl trip, you have a chance to go out there and play and leave on a winning note," he said.

And do that K-State will, Carter said, as he feels assured the Cats won't repeat its performance in 1998, when the Cats also lost the Big 12 Championship game and then fell 37-34 to unranked Purdue in the Builders Square Alamo Bowl.

"This is not a couple years ago — a team that fell down, fell apart," Carter said. "This team is strong in character and we'll go out there and give it our all. We just want to go out with a victory."

OKLAHOMA

Missed tackles took its toll on the Wildcats.

For instance, with just more than five minutes into the second half and OU looking at third-and-26 on their own 26-yard line, Sooners QB Josh Heupel hit receiver Antwone Savage on a short pass on the right sideline. Savage would elude five would-be tacklers on his way to a 74-yard touchdown and a 38-14 Oklahoma lead.

That play would have an effect on the outcome of the ball game, as the Cats began to come alive in the fourth quarter.

After a third quarter field goal by senior placekicker Jamie Rheem, wide-out Quincy Morgan started things off in the final period, eluding a few tacklers of his own en route to a 69-yard TD reception from quarterback Jonathan Beasley, cutting the OU advantage to 38-24.

Then the Cat special teams unit did their part.

With OU facing fourth-and-19 from their own 28-yard line, junior Drew Thalmann burst straight through the middle of the OU punt team, smothering the Sooners kick.

The ball was recovered and returned 16 yards for a touchdown by Terence Newman, bringing new life to the Cats and slicing the deficit in half, 38-31.

"That was a great play that got the swing going even more and the momentum switched," junior free safety Jon McGraw said. "It really put us in good position to come back and win that game."

And the Cats would get that opportunity, at least for a tie.

On first down in K-State territory, Heupel pitched the ball to running back Renaldo Works, who ran right and pulled up, looking to throw. McGraw sniffed out the halfback pass and intercepted Works' attempt, which was intended for Savage, at K-State's 11, giving Beasley and the offense a chance to drive.

But they stalled, as the Sooners defense forced a three-and-out, and OU would add a 24-yard field goal by Tim Duncan to put icing on the cake.

KANSAS

That offensive success would only escalate as the game progressed, as Beasley finished the day with 271 yards of total offense, 235 through the air, and five touchdowns.

The win over their in-state rivals is still highly regarded by the Wildcats, especially the Kansas natives.

"With all the Kansas kids on the club, it was a very intense ball game for us all week and there's a lot of guys that got excited for it," said senior defensive end Monty Beisel, a native of Douglass, Kan. "And I'm just excited for my fourth victory in a row over Kansas, and I've never lost to the Jayhawks."

Several issues subject of continued SGA attention

By BRYAN SCRIBNER
Kansas State Collegian

Students will be directly affected next semester by decisions made by Student Senate this fall, Student Body President Jake Worcester said.

Senate adopted legislation endorsing mandatory rental property inspections in Manhattan on Sept. 7. Worcester said making progress toward an inspection program was the most significant decision this year.

Inspections could increase rental rates $1 per month for the nearly 16,000 students living off campus. About 45 percent of all housing in Manhattan is rental property. If acquired, a program would be in compliance with the Board of Code Administrator's Code.

The inspections would ensure that minimum safety requirements are met. There is no current plan set by the city. Worcester said Senate would work with the city toward a solution.

"We've been very fortunate to have support from the city commission," he said.

Worcester said public transportation could also affect students. Research conducted for the city was introduced to students Nov. 2 at an open house in the K-State Student Union.

The open house displayed a two-route community system and campus parking shuttle plan. Worcester said students could be asked to contribute funding next semester through increased privilege fees. He also said a SafeRide system might be an indirect benefit of public transportation.

"I think we could do that for a relatively minimal cost," he said. "We want to give our input."

Although Senate has been involved in city issues and will be working with Manhattan next semester, Worcester said campus issues such as the improvement of advising and other student services will be of concern for most students.

A task force is researching a new university advising policy. Worcester said his administration's top priority is improving the quality of campus advisers. He said students should have minimal expectations when they meet with their advisers.

"We think it's important that students know we're working on that issue," he said.

The task force should complete final plans in January, Worcester said. Legislation might be introduced to Senate in mid-February, and a solution should be completed before the conclusion of the spring semester.

In addition to advising, Senate will be introduced to a proposal next semester that might enable students to access unofficial transcripts via KATS, Worcester said. If the idea is adopted, it also might include an online transcript request form.

Worcester also said the construction of a $4.8 million student activities center was an important initiative taken by Senate this fall. Students voted Nov. 12 not to help fund the activities center through privilege fees, but Worcester said it was good to reintroduce the concept.

"One of our goals from the beginning was to let students voice their opinions on that," he said.

Senate passed a privilege fee continuance bill Sept. 29 that allotted $405,695 to the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics for the fiscal years of 2001-04. The student-generated funding supports all non-revenue sports. Full-time students are assessed $11.54 each semester.

As a result of the legislation, there will be an additional 2,000 guaranteed student seats available at home football games. Privilege Fee Chair Ryan Walker said the seats would be a significant change at 2001 games.

Walker said the Privilege Fee Committee would be working on allocations for the Union this spring. He said the Union's repair and replacement, recreation services and Union Governing Board allocations will be reviewed as one package. The process will start Jan. 15.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Jill Szynskie said that although an increased amount of allocations to campus organizations this fall has been positive, it has taken time away from other important subjects. Senators have given allocations a lot of attention, but she said it would be important for Senate to concentrate on issues such as advising, transportation and rental inspections next semester.

"This semester I feel like we've been allocating a lot of money but not tackling many issues," she said.

Worcester said student government is composed of efficient and diverse decision-makers this year.

"The student body should be confident that students in student government are looking for real solutions," he said.

Local levels of child care vary

By CRISTINA JANNEY
Kansas State Collegian

Not all child care services are created equal.

"I tend to see levels of care at all ends," said Sharon Wolff, child care licensing surveyor for Riley County.

"Some have excellent care. Some are struggling, and some are illegal."

The Riley County Health Department might investigate up to three complaints a month, and they can range from slight problems to serious safety issues, Wolff said.

Most violations can be resolved at the local level, but some serious complaints are referred by state authorities to the legal department of the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. The legal process might take months. Unless a license had an emergency revocation, providers are allowed to stay in operation and accept new children.

This is why Wolff said she thinks it is important to check on providers' backgrounds, ask questions and visit the providers' location.

Parents can check the records of child care providers for free by calling the state health department in Topeka. The records contain any complaints against health and safety violations by the providers.

"We teach parents to be careful consumers," Wolff said. "Licensing does not mean care is safe or right for their child."

Although Kansas' regulations tend to be strong compared to other states, Wolff said she wanted to stress they are minimum standards.

Providers can be either licensed or registered. Local health departments can't inspect registered providers unless complaints are made against them. Licensed providers are subject to unannounced inspections annually unless there are complaints.

Parents can file complaints by calling the local health department for any concerns or the Social Rehabilitation Services office in cases of abuse or neglect. Infant and toddler care is in highest demand, said Susy Toland, infant and toddler specialist with the Flint Hills Resource and Referral.

The agency will provide names of care givers and centers in the area based on location, price, times and ages of children. The service is free.

Infant care also is the most expensive. It can cost up to $175 a week, and only two centers in Manhattan will take children under the age of 1.

Home care, where care for children under 17 months can range from $95 to $100 a week, is a common alternative for infants and toddlers.

For children who are too young to talk, parents should watch for bruises in atypical places. Bruises might resemble something like a hand or fingers, Toland said.

Parents should maintain good communication with their providers and a high level involvement with their children.

Toland said parents should look for providers who will stay engaged with their children. Children of this age need to be talked to, held and hugged. Providers should be willing to get on the floor and play with them.

"The key for them is to be there and be available to catch those teachable moments and build those bonds," she said.

Parents share concerns with child care

Kyle and Alex Sweet's parents reluctantly drop them off at child care every weekday. Kyle usually is anxious to go, but Alex keeps asking how many days of school he has left.

Kyle, 2, has been in child care since he was an infant, and Alex, 5, has been in care on and off for three years. The two boys spend almost nine hours a day in child care. Their parents still sometimes have problems letting go.

"You think the best people to be around your kids is yourself," Eric Sweet, junior in education, said. "It is just hard sometimes to go off to work and school when you want to be with them."

Sweet, who works third shift, sometimes lacks sleep during the week, so he can be awake a few hours in the evening with his sons. He works full time and also goes to school full time.

Finding the right care for his children was the hardest part of putting the boys in child care, he said. His wife, Jessica, who works at Jardine Terrace Apartments, made most of the arrangements.

Jessica Sweet said she asked a lot of questions and visited the providers.

"It was hard to find a provider that would be in my budget, and I would trust with my kids," she said.

Home care provided a more homey environment and meant Kyle would be in a Student enjoys 1st semester away from home

By MICHELLE BERTUGLIA

For one freshman, Manhattan is a long way from Lakin, Kan.

With one semester down and about nine left, Craig Wanklyn, freshman in architectural engineering and Lakin native, said he feels his first semester living away from home has been a good one.

"It was tough being away from home. I have had some hard times," Wanklyn said. "But I am getting used to it, and Manhattan has become my home away from home."

At the beginning of the semester, Wanklyn said he didn't have plans for getting involved with extracurricular activities at K-State. He said he wanted to take the first semester to feel things out.

With a full class load, extra introductory classes and full involvement in the residence halls, Wanklyn has done more than just feel out a place; he has found a place for himself.

But after the intense climate of his first semester, Wanklyn said he is ready for a break.

"I am not just ready to go home. I am ready to be done with this semester," Wanklyn said. "It has been very challenging and stressful at times. Now I am looking forward to some free time when I go home for winter break."

Being involved has made the Kansas Supreme Court hears death-penalty case

TOPEKA — The last time the Kansas Supreme Court handled a death penalty case, the justices did not have many questions about how they would rule.

The U.S. Supreme Court in 1972 issued its ruling in Furman v. Georgia, which invalidated all states' capital punishment laws. The Kansas court didn't even need an appeal from a death-row inmate to follow with its own statement that the state law could not stand.

That element of certainty will be gone when the justices hear arguments at 1:30 p.m. Wednesday on the appeal of Gary Wayne Kleypas. He faces lethal injection for the 1996 killing of Carrie Williams in Pittsburg.

The U.S. Supreme Court began approving new, more carefully written capital punishment laws in 1976. Kansas didn't enact its law until 1994, and Kleypas has raised 51 legal issues in his appeal, including whether the Kansas law is constitutional.

Legislators and other state officials will be watching how the court rules on procedural issues, such as Kleypas' allegations of jury misconduct and whether jury instructions in his case were proper. In deciding those matters, the court could make it more difficult for prosecutors to obtain death sentences.

In 1973, the capital punishment issue before the Kansas Supreme Court was much simpler to resolve. In Furman, the U.S. Supreme Court invalidated Georgia and Texas capital punishment laws, saying a state could not give a judge or jury unfettered discretion in deciding whether a convicted killer would die or spend life in prison.

At the time, Kansas law left the decision of whether the death penalty should be imposed to the jury if a capital case went to trial. If a defendant pleaded guilty, the judge determined the sentence.

The law contained no further guidelines.

The case before the Kansas Supreme Court in 1973 was the appeal of Allen Dale Randol, convicted of shooting a woman to death while robbing a Hays hotel in January 1971.

In his appeal, Randol suggested that the entire sentencing law was unconstitutional because life in prison was the alternative for juries and judges to imposing the death penalty.

The Kansas court rejected that argument but took the opportunity to note the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Furman and applied it to the Kansas capital punishment law.

Shawnee County people to receive Jesus videos

TOPEKA — Residents of Shawnee County can expect to receive a free video about Jesus Christ in the mail, just in time for Christmas 2001. A few months later, they'll be asked by telephone if they have seen the video and if they wish to become Christians.

However, some religious leaders in Topeka expressed concern over mailing the video to all households, saying doing so doesn't take into consideration the religious preferences of others.

Plans for the mass mailing were announced Tuesday by leaders of the Shawnee County Jesus Video Project, part of a California-based worldwide drive begun in 1992 as a ministry of Campus Crusade for Christ International.

In all, organizers expect to spend $250,000 to send the video — called "Jesus" — to 74,000 homes in Shawnee County. Churches, businesses and individuals are to fund the effort.

Rich O'Brian, chairman of the county project and station manager of Christian radio station KBUZ-FM, said the goal is to bring people face to face with Jesus Christ.

Organizers hope at least 40

Called Mirena, the device prevents pregnancy for five years. It has long been popular in Europe.

While the FDA called it just another option for birth control, some women's advocates call Mirena a more modern IUD that might help re-ignite Americans' interest in intrauterine devices.

IUDs sit in the uterus to block conception. Worldwide, they are the most popular birth control device. Americans already can buy the Paragard IUD, also known as a "copper-T" IUD, which provides 10 years of birth control.

Mirena works through the traditional IUD design and by releasing tiny amounts of the hormone levonorgestrel into the uterus. It's about 99 percent effective at preventing pregnancy, but the ability to become pregnant quickly returns when Mirena is removed, manufacturer Berlex Laboratories, said.

Berlex said Mirena will begin selling early next year but did not disclose a price.

Changes make freshman anxious about return home

By NANCY FOSTER
Kansas State Collegian

Things might be a little different when Kyle Yaeger, a native Alaskan, heads for home over winter break.

"I have a feeling things will blow up when I go home," Yaeger, freshman in business, said. "I have changed my ways a little bit since I've been on my own."

The pattern he does things in might conflict with that of his parents, but regardless, he said he is excited to return home.

"I would be more excited if they had been getting real snow, but it'll be good to see my mom and dad and the dog. I'm excited to go home, but I'll probably be excited to come back," Yaeger said.

His father, Chris Yaeger, said they are looking forward to him being around again.

"It'll be good to have him home for a while," he said.

He said they hadn't missed him too much, though, because they knew he had been enjoying himself.

"We've been busy doing stuff, and he's been reporting in that he's been having a good time, so it's been good," he said.

Weather in Anchorage, Alaska, has been especially warm lately, Yaeger said, and because of that, he probably won't be able to go snow boarding — something he was looking forward to.

However, he will get to go skiing. He is coming back from Alaska a week early and heading to Colorado with some of his fraternity brothers.

The friends he has made through the Theta Chi fraternity are good, Yaeger said, and so is the fraternity.

"It's been fun so far," he said. "It continues to serve the purpose I intended it to."

It has given him a base of friends that he can rely on and count on, he said, which is what he was looking for.

"I can drop by someone's house and just say hi without them knowing I'm coming first," he said.

Being involved with the fraternity has kept him busy, he said, and so has hanging out with friends.

For the Big 12 Championship game, he and a couple of friends drove to Kansas City, Mo., and stayed with his uncle. On the way there, however, they encountered a little unexpected excitement.

"I slightly wrecked my car. It was snowing leaving Topeka, and I basically did a 360 merging onto the Interstate," he said. "I wasn't being reckless. The car's just not made for that kind of weather."

He scraped the side of guard rail, leaving large scratches on his new sports car. Yaeger said since anything could have happened, he was lucky nothing else did.

The rest of the trip went much more smoothly, though.

"It was a good trip. It's just a shame we lost," he said.

Yaeger has also made friends in the residence halls that he lives in during the past four months.

"I think we have an unusual situation in our hall, where a lot of our guys hang out," he said. "I feel privileged to be a part of that."

He said that was just how he imagined it to be when he first arrived at K-State.

"It's kind of like our own little fraternity,

EVAN SEMON/Collegian

Kyle Yaeger, freshman in business, and Bob Wakefield, sophomore in management information systems, are both members of the Theta Chi fraternity. The two men, along with other members of the fraternity, stopped at the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority house to sing Christmas carols Wednesday night.

We can depend on each other. There's not a time in the day when you can walk down the hall and not see someone," he said.

"That really kind of adds security."

As for classes, they haven't become anymore demanding since the beginning of the year, and finals are not something he is too worried about.

"Most of them are not going to be comprehensive, so I'm not anymore worried than I am about previous chapter tests," he said.

Away from home for four months, Yaeger's father said he was beginning to notice changes in his son.

"He's just acting more mature," Chris Yaeger said. "He's finding out there's things he didn't know about before he left home, that he's learning about now, such as finding out that if you don't clean out the coffee pot, things will grow in it."

Manhattan Christian College prepares for library renovations

By JESSICA LEDUC
Kansas State Collegian

While K-State enjoys the benefits of a renovated library, Manhattan Christian College soon will enjoy the benefits of a permanent one.

"There are a number of reasons for a new library," said Jolene Rupe, director of public relations at MCC. "We want to give it a permanent home."

The temporary MCC library is located in the main classroom building on campus. Classrooms have been remodeled to provide space for the library.

"It's very tight quarters," Lori Jo Stanfield, vice president of business, said. "Our librarian has to be creative of where he places resources so that students can find them."

Plans are in the works to change all that. The new library will be moving to Jolliffe Hall once renovations are completed, Stanfield said renovations could start as early as fall 2001 or as late as spring 2002.

"It is more likely that it will be in early spring of 2002," Stanfield said. "But, assuming the fund-raising is completed, we could start as early as October 2001."

Jolliffe Hall was chosen because it was rich in history, Rupe said.

"The location was chosen because of the history of the building," she said. "It's been a part of campus since its founding, and it was only appropriate that it become the permanent home of the library."

Rupe said she feels it is important for the library to become a visible part of the MCC campus.

"I think it reflects the college's commitment to education because that is what its product is," Rupe said.

The permanent library will not only have books, but also will have other learning tools for students, Rupe said that as resources and finances come in, the library will try to upgrade their technology, along with expanding the number of its volumes.

"We want students to be able to look at online databases across the state and country to find resources," Rupe said.

Another aspect that possibly will be included in the library is distance learning. This is an area MCC has not worked with before.

"We haven't started at all," Rupe said. "We have no current program, and we want to have the capability to expand in that area."

The burden of financing the permanent library will not rest on MCC students' shoulders, Rupe said the library will be paid for by contributions from alumni donors, churches, grant money from foundations and matching gifts from corporations.

"It's a group effort of all the constituencies of the college," Rupe said. "The only way it will be funded is if everyone works together."

13 suggestions to improve life on, off campus

Listed below are things the Collegian editorial board would like to see changed in future semesters at K-State.

- 1) Student housing standards should be increased.
- 2) Mid-Campus Drive should return to being a two-way.
- 3) A solution to the parking problem should be found.
- 4) Fans of the football team should support it regardless of its success. To be a true fan means you stand by them through it all.
- 5) There should be stronger support for all teams, including equestrian.
- 6) Student Governing Association should focus on more than one big project and spread out its efforts.
- 7) The problems involving Denison Hall should be fixed. This can be done by either completely renovating it or destroying it.
- 8) If Lafene Health Center does move, there should be transportation provided to its new location.
- 9) KSU Alumni Association should get in gear in terms of building its center.
- 10) Legislature should match our privilege fees.
- 11) There should be an increased amount of books and resources at Hale Library.
- 12) Cubs and organizations should do more with the college as well as the community as a whole.

OUR VIEW
is an editorial selected and debated by the editorial board and written after a majority opinion is formed. OUR VIEW is the Collegian's official opinion.

Gift of Giving

Past financial condition indicates importance of charitable contributions

That time of year is here. The season when people count their blessings and are thankful for all they have. The season when, according to Hollywood, people rethink their wicked ways and resolve to bring joy to the world, decking the halls and jingling the bells.

I know there are many things I'm thankful for this year. I'm glad no one has blown up the world in a fit of rage. I'm grateful both of my ferrets made it through the cancer scare of this summer. I'm thankful my family and friends are healthy. I'm thankful Harrison Ford and Sean Connery exist.

Knowing I have so many things to be thankful for, I sometimes forget that others might not be so fortunate. Coming from a small farm town, I was never really exposed to anyone I would consider unfortunate. Sure, some of my friends' families didn't have much money, but who did? Everyone had enough to eat, and there always were presents under the tree. It never occurred to me that Santa might not visit everyone's house like he visited mine.

Even after I came to college, I still lived in a bubble. Sure, I watched the news. I read things that made reference to the growing number of homeless people. I read features in People Weekly Magazine about food drives for low-income families that just couldn't make ends meet.

It never seemed real. When I moved out of the residence halls and into an apartment of my own, the financial struggle I'd heard about became a reality. I remember being forced to "borrow" toilet paper from public restrooms until I managed to find a job. Sometimes the choice came down to food and electricity or rent for the month, or much to the demise of my credit rating, neither.

I eventually pulled myself out of that pit, but I still remember the fear of not knowing if I would have a place to live next week. Many people are not as lucky as I was. Sometimes, no matter how hard they try, they just cannot pull themselves out.

This year is the first year I've really felt as if I've got my feet back under me. I have two jobs that bring in fairly steady pay. I have a comfortable place to live, with two roommates who have no trouble covering their share of the bills (and mine if I need an extra week, or vice versa).

Every time I pass a bell ringer in the street or hear about a food or gift drive, I think of how lucky I am.

Have you ever stood and watched a Salvation Army bell ringer? Try it. See how many people avert their eyes and keep walking. Watch those people who stop and dig out some spare change — do they look happier?

Today, I went to Dillons to buy drain cleaner, and I noticed the bell ringer. No one stopped. True, I only watched for a few minutes, but it still made me sad. When I left the store and stopped to drop some money in his bucket, he seemed almost startled. I don't know if it was because I look like a student, and students tend to hold onto every dollar for ramen and laundry, or if it was just that no one had stopped in a while.

Either way, I wished I had more to give, and I was thankful I could afford to give anything at all.

I wish everyone would stop sugar coating K-State's loss to Oklahoma. In fact, stop sugar coating their whole season all together. Three losses; K-State is no powerhouse.

In regards to the student who thinks our stadium is called Wagner Field, the OU fan was right. The field is Wagner Field, the stadium is KSU Stadium.

This is to the basketball team: why don't you take notes from the volleyball team on how to get to the Sweet 16?

The only thing more painful than chemistry is childbirth.

Yeah, when I went to class this morning I didn't know I would need my ice skates for the sidewalks.

People who tailgate and speed on snow and ice, when they have their infants in the car, should not be permitted to breed any further. Thank you.

All right, enough is enough. Gore and Bush into the Thunderdome. Let's determine a winner.

Win, lose, do or die. I am a Wildcat fan until I die. We will see everyone in Dallas.

I'm inclined to kind of like the Cotton Bowl. The touch, the feel of cotton, the fabric of our lives.

I've seen the Kansas State men's basketball team play, and judging by their lack of skills, they need plenty of practice unless they plan on only playing Manhattan High.

Publication promotes racism, sexism, hate

A sixth-grader has significantly more command of the English language than does The Whipping Post, a publication that seems to be insidiously weaving its way into our community. This, however, is the least of its sins — but it would be nice if they could spell correctly and use apostrophes with at least some regard to possession.

The Whipping Post has no place in Manhattan because of its overtly misogynistic and racist content. The wasted paper and brain cells that this newspaper produces is a travesty, and I'm planning a complete boycott of any business that advocates this paper in any way.

Aggieville seems to be a favorite spot to drop off copies of this disgusting pulp, and I've been told that Streetside Records, Varney's Book Store and coffee shops have been distributing it. I got my copies from a cooperative clerk at the Master Gamer, and I regret even soiling my hands with its ink. The K-State Student Union, the residence halls, random classrooms and greek houses also are advertised as distribution points, leading me to believe that the administration of K-State approves of this paper, whose very name conjures up images of violence and terror.

"Honkeys on Parade," from the Nov. 13, 2000 edition, is an article which describes the word "honkey" as "a fun racial slur aimed at silly white people." Is free speech the enterprise that The Whipping Post pursues, or is this simply hate speech in disguise? Not only does the article label a number of politicians and entertainers with this "fun racial slur," it barely makes sense because it was so poorly written. This, however, was only the beginning. Another deciding factor which drives my hatred of The Whipping Post is its treatment of women.

The Whipping Post tells its readers in a column titled "The Male Manifesto" that women are "not equal to us and they will never be equal. They are not meant to help govern the world or to help the economy. They are meant to help populate the world. We must understand that we are stronger, smarter, and damn it, better than women..." The multi-edition article goes on to say that "So, unless our dick is in your mouth, close that big trap." Being male, according to this columnist, primarily hinges on activities like violent sex and the mental, if not physical, abuse of women. "...We believe that they are made for our pleasure before their own." "To the sniveling bitches that believe that this is nothing but chauvinist crap, deal with it. There are millions of men who view life the same way."

This is quite apparent.

The majority staff of the Senate Judiciary Committee compiled violence against women statistics in 1990. Of particular interest to Collegian readers is that one in seven women attending college has been raped, and more than 40 percent of college women who have been raped say they expect to be raped again. Serious crimes against women rise at a significantly faster rate than the total crime rate; rape rates in particular have risen nearly four times as fast as the total crime rate. It's 10 years later, and my personal experience tells me these statistics probably have NOT lowered. Since three out of four women (that would be you and me, ladies) will be victims of at least one violent crime during our lifetimes, it makes sense that we stop the distribution of rape-culture propaganda. Especially of concern to me are the lies that K-State preaches to incoming students about rape on this campus and among the students. The KSU Fact Book of 2000-2001 states that in 1999, only one "non-forcible" rape occurred on this campus.

What is "non-forcible" rape? How big do our bruises need to be until rape and all other abuse against women is treated like any other crime, until women no longer have to face humiliation and shame in reporting assault against them? How much psychological trauma must women face until they are treated with respect?

How many of our sisters must be murdered before people will take action?

Women's rights are human rights, and crimes against women are crimes against humanity. I knew women in high school who were raped and didn't know what to call it. I know of rapes that have happened to college women, most right here on campus. I know brave survivors of battery who attend this university right now whose lives are forever colored by the fact that they were abused by someone they thought they could trust.

It is your date, it is your brother, father, boyfriend, classmate or teacher; it probably will be someone close to you who beats and/or rapes you. Acquaintance rape happens in a much higher proportion than strangers assaulting you, although it does happen as well.

Those statistics from the Senate Judiciary Committee also showed that since 1974, the rate of assault against young women aged 20-24 has jumped 48 percent, while the same age group of men have enjoyed a 12 percent decrease.

Promoting respect for all people is essential in the attempt to stop what should be known as a men's problem: violence against women. What's cheaper, preventative health care or emergency surgery? More needs to be done to cultivate respect and tolerance among people, rather than trying to slap bandages on the gaping wounds of racism and sexism. Hate speech that advocates and encourages the domination, subjugation and harassment of women or any other human never should be tolerated.

Do me a favor and go back to where I quoted from "The Male Manifesto." Substitute any racial slur, any ethnic group, or any nationality where it reads "women." Recognize its rhetoric as that which has justified slavery, genocide and other abhorrent crimes. Do you want this sort of message in the hands of young people who are patrons of the K-State campus or Aggieville? The Whipping Post might seem amusing, trivial, or just another thing to ignore. I assure you that from the smallest acorn mighty oaks can grow. Will they shade you or will they choke you out by the root?

I call for an end to rape and abuse culture in Manhattan. The Whipping Post is detrimental to our common humanity. I urge you to read this paper for yourself and decide if this is really the attitude that you want to promote among the people of this town; as for me, advertisers and distributors of this publication will receive no more of my business. Cellular One, you nearly sold me a phone — nice try. Streetside, I'll get CDs from the mall. Varney's, I'll order my textbooks online. Master Gamer, I don't plan to darken your door.

Misogyny and racism is not free speech. It's hate speech infiltrating this town disguised as an exercise of Constitutional rights. Unless you protest hate speech, you might see yourselves deprived of the right to free speech. I challenge all of you to think of the atrocities of Nazi Germany and the words of Martin Niemöller: "If we do not speak for those who are being persecuted, even though we ourselves are not persecuted by virtue of our privilege, then the day will come when no one will be left to protest our own demise." Respect is the fundamental right of every living being on this planet, and since The Whipping Post probably couldn't spell it, I suggest that it cannot promote it.

KELLY GLASSCOCK/Collegian

Christie Horton, freshman in open-option, talks with friends after helping give a presentation for a leadership studies and programs class. Horton said preparing for finals week has been the hardest part of college so far.

Horton looks forward to holidays

By JESSICA PITTS
Kansas State Collegian

Christie Horton, freshman in open-option, is ready for winter break.

"I can't wait for it to get here," she said. "School is getting stressful, so it will be nice to just have that break from it all. Plus, I am looking forward to a constant supply of good food. I miss the home cooking."

Horton, who is from Manhattan, said she doesn't have any big plans for the holidays.

"Probably the same old stuff," she said. "Since my parents live in Manhattan, I don't have to travel a long ways. We usually go to my grandparents' house for Christmas."

Horton said she also is going to try to go to the Cotton Bowl with some of her friends.

"I think it would be fun to go down to Texas," Horton said. "It would be a great way to just have fun after all this stress."

Horton said preparing for finals week has been the hardest part of college so far.

"Everything is going great, but it has been stressful for my first experience of college finals," she said. "They are a lot different than high school. I am even studying for them differently. I am somewhat worried, but not deathly worried. It just takes a lot of time."

Horton also has a part-time job at Dillons while attending school.

"It can make things really crazy, too," she said. "My hours really differ each week, but for example, this week I am working 27 hours on top of getting ready for finals. If my grades aren't as high as they should be, my job is why. It is hard to balance that, school and my sorority."

Horton joined the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority at the beginning of the semester. So far, she said it is what really helped her get involved in school.

"The sorority is going really good," she said. "We just had a Christmas party that was really fun, and we had a date party last week that was fun because we got to get all dressed up. Right now, things are kind of winding down because we are getting ready for next semester. There is just not a lot going on right now."

Horton lives in Boyd Hall this semester with her best friend, Sarah Wiegert, freshman in biology. She said they plan to stay in the residence halls next semester.

"We get along really great," Horton said. "There really hasn't been any major disagreements yet. We have a lot of fun together, and it is nice to have someone you can vent to right there all the time."

Next year the two will move into their sorority houses. However, they will have to separate because they belong to different sororities.

"Sarah is in Alpha Chi Omega, so we won't be living together," Horton said. "That may be kind of hard for us at first."

Wiegert said she agrees that the separation might take a little getting used to.

"At first it will be weird, but I hope we will still be able to talk a lot," Wiegert said. "We will just have to try and stay close."

FROM THE BEGINNING

City population increase raises water questions

By SCOTT ALDIS-WILSON
Kansas State Collegian

Manhattan might have plenty of water for the immediate future, but the city is looking at just how thirsty it might be in a few decades.

According to figures from lead consultant CH2M HILL, the maximum growth for Manhattan by 2025 would result in a population of 117,550 compared to its current population just short of 50,000. Under the maximum growth projection, consultants said the city's water use could increase from the current maximum of 17.5 million gallons a day to 45 mgd.

To more than double maximum treatment capacity, options are being considered to construct a new water treatment plant or to expand the existing one near Goodnow Park.

Even so, Jerry McIntyre, director of utilities, said the increase was based on maximum growth potential.

"Twenty-five years, that's the quickest. It might take longer," he said. "It all depends on how fast the city grows."

Tom Heinemann, project manager through the Denver-based CH2M HILL, said the maximum 2025 population projection was 117,550 and minimum was about 80,000. The reality, he said, probably will fall in the middle.

"Keep in mind, we looked at a range of population growth scenarios," he said. "It becomes apparent even if that population isn't reached in 2025, it eventually, probably, will be."

Though CH2M HILL is still drafting a facilities plan and cost of services, Heinemann said early projections suggest the costs of a new westside water plant and expansion of the east plant are almost equal.

"Those costs were actually within 10 percent of each other," he said.

In the meantime, he said he hoped the final report will be ready for presentation to the Manhattan City Commission by late February with more exact numbers and an implementation plan. In addition, he said the company has been looking at Manhattan's short-term preparation for a growing water population.

McIntyre said short-term improvements for water treatment have been gauged at about $4 million and already entered into the revised 2000-2001 budget and expected to run into the following year. By modifying wells where the water originates, pumps and the waterline itself, he said capacity could grow well beyond its average of about 6 mgd and the 17.5 mgd maximum.

"We should be able to get 20 million gallons a day once we look at those," he said.

Gary Kinney, manager of the plant, said the current facility, built in 1970 and renovated in 1990, replaced the older structure that had a maximum treatment capacity of about three to four mgd. The current plant was working close to capacity last summer, he said, with a demand of about 15 mgd on the hotter days. Each of the plant's eight filters, a combination of charcoal, silica sand and three grades of gravel, process about 2 million gallons, he said. With work, they might be brought up to 2.5 million gallons each, he said. Between the current maximum processing and another 6 million gallons of treated water in towers citywide, Kinney said Manhattan won't have to worry about a water shortage for years.

"Not yet," he said. "We're trying to plan ahead."

Sophomore standout continues to excel

By DAN SMITH
Kansas State Collegian

It must be tough for cross country coach Randy Cole to be less than giddy when discussing the potential of his team, particularly that of sophomore standout Amy Mortimer.

Coming off a 10th-place team finish at the National Championships on Nov. 20, one of the school's finest, Cole won't deny his high expectations for Mortimer.

In fact, he said her encore performance next fall could prove to be one of K-State's best ever, as the sophomore will be coming off a sixth place showing at the 2000 NCAA championships, which tied Chris Vanatta's 1986 NCAA finish for the best mark in Wildcat history.

"We knew she was going to be pretty good, but now what we're seeing is that she is just scratching the surface of what she can do," Cole said. "I think that with her accumulation of training up here it will get pretty exciting to see how she continues to progress."

After a spectacular four-year career as one of Riley County High School's most celebrated runners, it seemed as though one of the country's premier programs such as Brigham Young, Stanford or Colorado would come calling for her services.

She waited, but finally the Kansas high school record-holder in the mile chose to remain close to home and attend K-State — and Mortimer couldn't be happier with her decision.

"I really like it here," she said. "Every day I realize that this is probably the perfect fit for me as an athlete."

Cole and the rest of the coaching staff are happy she chose the Wildcats as well. After seeing Mortimer rewrite the Kansas record books during her prep career, Cole was ecstatic to see her don the purple and white for the first time.

"She was putting up good marks off of decent training, so we knew she was one of the better runners to come out of the state," he said.

"It's very exciting to see how she really improved her performances in such a short time."

"Her times have shown that she's one of the best collegiate runners today."

Cole said that although what Mortimer did on the course was exciting in its own right, her personality is what made her adjustment to K-State such an easy transition.

"I saw her personality and her demeanor," he said.

"This girl was a good, down-to-earth person and also had a good work ethic. She had a sense of wanting to do well."

Cats fall to Ole Miss

JUSTIN HAYWORTH/Collegian

Richie Terry lets the ball fly over the outstretched arms of Marcus Griffin as he collides with Cory Bradford during the first half of their game Saturday afternoon at Bramlage Coliseum. Terry was called for charging on the play, and the Wildcats lost to the 8/9th ranked Fighting Illini, 76-56.

Rebels maintain lead throughout KSU loss

By DEREK BOSS
Kansas State Collegian

A game with no lead change generally speaks for itself; the team that scored first won the ball game.

That was the case Tuesday night in Oxford, Miss., as Rebel guard Jason Holmes' three-pointer 10 seconds from the opening tip led undefeated Ole Miss (6-0) over K-State (2-3), 60-46. Kelvin Howell's three-point play 1:22 later knotted the score at 5, but that was the closest the Cats would get. Ole Miss proceeded to start a 12-2 run that gave the Rebels a 10-point advantage, one that would grow to 13 by halftime at 39-26.

Holmes sparked Ole Miss in the first 20 minutes, connecting on all five shots from the field, including a perfect 3-for-3 from beyond the arc.

However, the story of the first half was the Rebel defense, head coach Jim Woodruff said.

■ UP NEXT

K-State continues its three-game road swing Saturday, as the Cats travel to Norfolk, Va. to take on Old Dominion. Tip-off is set for 6:35 p.m.

"We just couldn't match their effort on defense. Their defense's physical play affected how we played on offense," he said. "They spread their defense out, and I guess we don't have the firepower to match that."

Meanwhile, Ole Miss' offensive firepower continued in the second stanza, as the Cats saw their deficit increase to 17 with 16:55 to play.

However, despite countering with a 6-0 run, K-State gave up a critical 9-0 spurt to Ole Miss from the 14:19 to 8:33 mark in the half. During that

Bietau inks 2nd recruit to 2001-02 tennis team

Head tennis coach Steve Bietau announced Tuesday the signing of Andrea Cooper.

The England native inked a national letter of intent to play tennis at K-State beginning with the 2001-02 school year.

Cooper is among her country's top 20 players in her age group.

That statistic impresses Bietau.

"Andrea has consistently been competing at a national level," the Cat coach said. "She has a great serve and a proven record in doubles."

"We feel like she's going to make an immediate impact. Andrea is capable of improving a great deal in the next few years."

Cooper boasts several career-best results. She was national doubles finalist at the 16 and under level, a national singles quarter finalist at the 14 and under level and a national doubles quarter finalist at the 18 and under level.

She is competing in England's national tournaments, after posting several wins over top-10 ranked opponents this year.

Cooper is Bietau's second member of the 2001-02 recruiting class, joining Manhattan High's Maria Rosenberg.

Women break records, beat Western Michigan

By MICHAEL NOLL
Kansas State Collegian

According to an old basketball adage, high percentage shots are located close to the basket.

That philosophy wasn't true for the K-State women's basketball team Tuesday night, as the Cats (6-1) shot down Western Michigan (1-4) 90-81 by burying a school-record 15 three-pointers, breaking the previous mark of 13 set five years ago.

K-State's 62.5-percent shooting from behind the arc was actually one percent better than its overall shooting percentage, while the 90 points scored was the team's highest total since posting 108 against Eastern Kentucky on Nov. 18, 1998.

No player better exhibited this trend than Kristin Rethman, who led the team with a career-high 27 points. The junior guard hit six of eight three-pointers but missed her only two-point shot of the night. She was, however, 9-for-10 from the free-throw line.

■ UP NEXT

K-State will stay on the road to take on Drake at 2 p.m. Saturday at the Knapp Center in Des Moines, Iowa.

Because Rethman's shooting — she drained five treys in the first half — the game was out of reach for Western Michigan nearly from the get-go.

The Cats went on a 17-2 run in just more than three minutes to jump to a 30-14 lead with 11:02 remaining in the first half.

In addition to Rethman's scoring burst, four other players ended the night with double-digit point totals. Freshman Nicole Ohlde was the next-highest scorer with 18 points.

Oklahoma State hires new football coach

By OWEN CANFIELD
The Associated Press

STILLWATER, Okla. — Oklahoma State gave Les Miles some anxious days before finally giving him the one job he wanted most.

Miles was hired Wednesday as Oklahoma State's football coach, ending a wild week in which the job first was accepted by the leading candidate and then rejected hours later.

In taking the job, Miles turned down a financial package worth about $700,000, saying nearly half should go toward assistant coaches' salaries. He said he would be happy with $400,000.

"I've never heard of that before," athletic director Terry Don Phillips said.

Miles, 47, who has been tight ends coach with the Dallas Cowboys the past three years, said he applied for just one job.

"I wanted to remove all doubt in the people that would make the decision I wanted to be," he said. "I wanted to be one place — right here."

Miles served as Oklahoma State's offensive coordinator from 1995 to '97. During the '97 season, the Cowboys went 8-4 and played in the Alamo Bowl — their only winning season and bowl trip since 1988.

He takes over for his former boss, Bob Simmons, who was forced out after a third straight losing season and the fifth in his six years at OSU.

"I would not be here if I didn't think that we could win and win consistently," Miles said.

Three years ago Mortimer was using that sense to win state titles as a Falcon instead of contending for national titles as a Wildcat.

However, through consistency and hard work in practice and training, the hometown hero already has gained the respect of her K-State teammates and coaches.

"She's got the eye of a tiger—she's a real competitor and she runs with a lot of heart," senior Annie Wetterhus said.

"She works for what she does, so she deserves everything that comes her way."

What's come her way is nothing short of incredible.

On her way to being named conference Freshman of the Year in 1999, Mortimer also was honored as an All-Big 12 and All-Midwest Region runner by making an immediate impact for the Wildcats, winning her first two collegiate races at the Maple Leaf Invitational and the Woody Greeno Invitational.

She also was named an All-American last fall, placing 12th at the NCAA Championships with a time of 16:59.

That type of success raised expectations for 2000, and Mortimer answered the call. The sophomore earned her second consecutive All-American honor in placing sixth at the NCAA championships, tying Chris Vanatta's 1986

NCAA finish for the best mark in Wildcat history.

"I appreciate it, because not everyone gets it," Mortimer said about her repeat selection as an All-American. "I'm just glad that I've been able to put in the work to get it."

Content with the past, Mortimer continues to aim even higher for the future. She said a national championship would be great, but constant improvement is her only true goal.

"I want to do everything," she said. "I'm kind of leery about making predictions about things. I think I have just one basic goal—I always want to be better."

Behind Mortimer's packed résumé is a runner who now can claim big-time collegiate race experience, something that makes her one of the most talented runners, ever, under Cole, he said.

"I've coached some girls before that have gone on to higher stages in their career," Cole said, "but at the same age, she's as good as anyone I've worked with, and that's a pretty exciting opportunity."

Although, there is always room for improvement, Cole said Mortimer is now in a position to compete for an individual title in her final two years as a Wildcat, something K-State has never had.

"Amy has the capability of being right in there," he said. "It's not a stretch at all to say she could be right in the hunt for the individual title. Physically and mentally, she's got all the tools to put herself in that position."

Non-traditional student seeks balance

By APRIL MIDDLETON

Kim Boyd, freshman in business, has renewed confidence that she can handle coming back to school.

Boyd is a married mother of three active children. She works full-time at an accounting firm and began taking classes part-time this semester at K-State.

Though she said working around a busy schedule is difficult at times, the rewards have far outweighed the struggles.

"I have really enjoyed my classes," Boyd said. "And knowing that I have done so well and maintained good grades gives me a huge sense of accomplishment."

Finding the time to study has been a struggle since the beginning for Boyd. Her children are all involved in sports, and she attends their games faithfully. She and her husband, David, also are youth directors at their church.

"Making time to study has been difficult. We usually have something going on every other night, so I don't have that time to use," Boyd said. "And the nights that we aren't busy, I would like to take a break."

Aside from balancing a tight schedule, Boyd has faced only one catastrophe this semester, one that was completely out of her control.

Boyd said her computer breaking has made it more difficult and time consuming to get her English papers written and edited. Boyd has been going to her office after hours to use the computers there.

"I haven't liked going to the office to do these things. When I'm at home I can sit and work for a while then take a break and talk to David, or get on to the kids for something they are or aren't doing," Boyd said. "It's just been more difficult to do it like this."

Although her husband makes jokes about becoming an expert at laundry, housework and cooking, he said it hasn't been that bad.

"I'm very proud of Kim," David Boyd said. "Even when she comes in hollering at me about her math class, I'm glad she's doing what she is."

Boyd is spending the week preparing for finals. She says the stress hasn't kicked in yet, but they it definitely has been in the back of her mind.

"My math instructor has told me that I almost have an 'A,'" Boyd said. "That means I have to do well on the final to get an 'A.' The pressure is on."

To Boyd, the pressure isn't from an outside source. The pressure she feels comes from herself because she wants to succeed and do well with her education.

"A 'B' is OK," Boyd said. "But my goal says I prefer something better than OK."

Boyd said she, like all students, could have put forth more effort in her studies and done a little better. For her, however, finding a balance in a hectic schedule means putting forth only so much time for any given activity.

"I just have to figure out what I need to get done. I'll admit that if I had applied myself a little more, especially in my math class, I would have breezed through it," Boyd said. "But I'm happy with where I'm at."

Happy might not emphasize accomplishments that Boyd has seen this semester.

"If anyone would have asked in the beginning," Boyd said, "I would never have been able to tell them that I'd be here doing so well today."

run, the Cats committed five of its season-high 20 turnovers, as the Rebel lead extended to its largest of the game at 20.

"Well, the runs in both halves hurt us," Wooldridge said. "We had a couple of runs, but we were behind. When you are behind you can't let your opponent go on a 9-0 run. You have to come up with stops if you want to get back in the game."

Those stops the Cats didn't make, although K-State would cut the lead to 12 with 4:59 remaining before falling 60-46 as the final buzzer sounded.

Junior transfer Matt Siebrandt led the Cats in both scoring and rebounding against Ole Miss, posting a near double-double with 11 points and nine boards.

Freshman tennis player learns about U.S. culture

MICHAEL YOUNG/Collegian

Paulina Castillejos, freshman in business, checks her e-mail Wednesday night in her West Hall dorm room. Finishing her first semester at K-State as a student athlete from Mexico, Castillejos has found a way to settle into a new environment.

By BRYAN MURPHY
Kansas State Collegian

The transition from high school in Mexico to college in the United States has been a rough one for Paulina Castillejos.

A freshman in business, Castillejos managed to balance a 16-hour class schedule, tennis practices and making new friends at K-State.

"To say the least, it has all been a great learning experience," Castillejos said. "I had lots of fun this first semester."

A big contributor to Castillejos' experiences this semester has been her roommate.

Sarah Ceer, freshman in business, gave Paulina a dose of American culture recently as Castillejos spent the Thanksgiving holiday with Ceer's family. Castillejos said she felt welcome and learned a few new things over break.

"Because I don't celebrate Thanksgiving in Mexico, Sarah explained everything to me. We actually eat the same types of food during Christmas celebrations in Mexico," Castillejos said.

In addition to her Thanksgiving history lesson, Castillejos attended an annual lighting ceremony of the Country Club Plaza in Kansas City, Mo., and got to do some shopping. Ceer commented very positively on the experience for both of them.

"Paulina really got into the celebration, and especially the shopping," Ceer said. "We went to do some shopping, and she bought more stuff than I did. All I've got to say is that Paulina loves clothes."

Castillejos has adjusted well in the classroom as the semester has unfolded. She said that test-taking is easier now, and she feels her grades will turn out well.

"I was having some difficulty in my geography class early on, but I have done better on the exams and I'll be getting a B at least," Castillejos said. "Next semester I plan on taking many classes that are harder, but I think I'm up to the challenge."

Ceer said Castillejos has settled rather well into the groove of being around lots of people from another culture and has even brought some of her own culture into Ceer's life.

"Paulina's not as busy as she was earlier in the semester," Ceer said. "I've taken the opportunity to learn some Spanish from her. She gives me vocabulary tests every week and they're starting to get harder."

Ceer said that although she and Castillejos are staying fairly busy, they have become good friends over the semester and plan on living together again next semester. While they aren't studying, Ceer and Castillejos have indulged themselves in some recreational activities.

"Paulina really loved the snow last night," Ceer said. "We had a snowball fight and she won. We had lots of fun with it."

Castillejos has also gained experience on the tennis court this semester that will assist her later on in her collegiate career.

In addition to working on some technicalities in her game, Castillejos has attended some tournaments. A recent tournament in Omaha, Neb. saw Castillejos defeat the No. 7 seed in her bracket before losing in the second round.

Unfortunately, Castillejos recently suffered a stress injury to her left and is going through the rehabilitation process.

"I really want to play and stay in shape, but I'm supposed to stay off my feet for right now," Castillejos said. "I don't like being injured, but taking some time off will help get me prepared for competition in the spring."

The semester drawing to a close, Castillejos' experiences during her first of many semesters at K-State have had a happy tone, and she can't wait to share those experiences with her family over winter break.

"I am glad to be finally going back home to Mexico to see my family. I have really missed them," Castillejos said. "It all went by so fast, and I can't wait to come back next semester and do it all over again."

Special session called to elect slate of Florida state electors

By DAVID ROYSE
The Associated Press

TALLAHASSEE, Fla. — Determined to support George W. Bush's pursuit of the White House, Republican leaders announced the Florida Legislature will convene in special session beginning Friday to appoint its own slate of electors in the state's contested presidential race.

Democrats instantly denounced the action as a mistake of historic proportions. But the Republican leaders of the House and Senate said Wednesday it was essential to ensuring the state's voters are represented when the Electoral College meets Dec. 18 and formally picks a president.

"We're protecting Florida's 25 electoral votes and its 6 million voters," said John McKay, the president of the state Senate.

Despite strong Republican majorities in both houses, McKay left the door open for the Senate to approve electors for Al Gore if the Democrat wins in the courts by the Dec. 12 deadline for choosing electors.

"Absolutely," he responded when asked if the Senate would vote for a Gore slate if Bush's 537-vote Florida lead is wiped out through legal maneuvering. He said lawmakers would have until Dec. 12 to decide.

"We're going to do our constitutional responsibility. I don't care if it's Gore or Nader or Bush," McKay said.

"I believe deeply... that we have a duty to protect Florida's participation in the Electoral College," said Rep. Tom Feeney, speaker of the House, who had been urging a special session for days.

Both men said they hoped final adoption of legislation establishing a slate of electors would be rendered unnecessary through a final court resolution of the election between Bush and Gore.

But, McKay added, "in the event there is not finality on the 12th, I think we will have to act."

Gore's camp called the Legislature's move "questionable and very disappointing."

"It is very strange that on the eve of arguments to the Supreme Court (Gov.) Jeb Bush and the Republican Party would send such a strong partisan message," Jenny Backus, spokeswoman, said.

"It seems like they aren't just content not to count the votes of 14,000 Floridians, they are willing to jettison the votes of 6 million Floridians in order to ensure victory for the governor's brother," she said, referring to Gore's legal fight for a hand recount of disputed ballots.

Bush's campaign defended the special session.

"The Florida Legislature made this decision on its own. It's a separately elected body. We have not participated in their making their decision," Dan Bartlett, spokesman, said.

Asked whether the session could be viewed as an insurance policy for Bush should the courts ultimately rule in Gore's favor and order a recount, Bartlett said: "We believe that the certified vote showing Governor Bush the winner of Florida will be upheld."

Bush has been certified the winner in Florida by 537 votes, but Gore is challenging that in the courts and seeking additional manual recounts. The vice president's claim was rejected in the trial court on Monday, and the state Supreme Court will hear arguments on his appeal on Thursday.

"It's inappropriate and it's unnecessary and it's unfair," Rep. Lois Frankel, leader of the House Democrats, said of the GOP decision to call a special session.

"We're circumventing the will of 6 million voters," she said. "The only thing missing on the proclamation is the postmark from Austin, Texas," a reference to Bush's campaign headquarters, but she conceded Democrats lack the votes to stop it.

Republicans have a 77-43 majority in the Florida House and a 25-15 advantage in the Senate.

McKay and Feeney told reporters they had not been pressured by the Bush campaign to call the special session. At the same time, the first time the idea was mentioned publicly it came from former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, Bush's point man in Florida.

Dec. 12 is the deadline for appointment of electors of the Electoral College, which meets Dec. 18. McKay, saying he was relying on advice offered by constitutional scholars, said he believed that was a date that could trigger the Legislature's action, not foreclose it.

"If we find a way to do our duty without bringing this session to a close with a final vote, then I would be the most pleased man in Florida," Feeney said.

Jeb Bush already has signed a certified slate of Republican electors for his brother, based on the 537-vote victory margin announced by the GOP secretary of state. If the courts invalidate that slate because of Gore's pending legal actions, the Republican-controlled Florida Legislature could use the session to override with a Bush slate.

If Congress gets competing slates and the two chambers disagree on which to accept, the slate signed by Florida's governor then will prevail, said Florida State University law professor Nat Stern. It wouldn't be the first time Florida lawmakers have been snagged in this kind of scenario.

In 1868, when Ulysses S. Grant was the GOP candidate, Republicans in Florida's Reconstruction-era Legislature turned aside Democratic protests and sent three GOP lawmakers to the Electoral College to vote for Grant.

The Florida Legislature last held a special session in January, when lawmakers took three days to pass laws making lethal injection the primary method of execution over the electric chair.

traditional foods enhance

Hanukkah memories

Story by Sarah McCaffrey ■ Photos by Karen Mikols

Regardless of what people choose to celebrate during the holiday season, food is always on everyone's mind at seasonal celebrations.

In the Jewish community, traditional Hanukkah favorites include potato latkes and sfganiyot. There is not a prescribed meal for the Hanukkah season because Hanukkah is not a religious holiday.

"It's more of a celebration than a holy holiday, unlike Christmas and Easter, which are Christian holy days," said Andrea Blair, a member of Hillel Jewish Student Organization.

An integral part of the Hanukkah celebration is the symbolism of the oil used for the Eternal Light. After the Jews regained the Temple from the Syrian-Greeks, they discovered there was only enough oil left to light the Eternal Light for one day. Then, one day the oil supply ended up being enough to last for eight days, which enabled messengers to find more oil.

Many of the traditional foods that are served for Hanukkah meals are subsequently fried or cooked in oil in remembrance of the oil used to keep the Eternal Light burning, Blair said.

One popular Hanukkah favorite is potato latkes.

Latkes are potato pancakes that resemble a thick hash-brown patty. Jody
Bell, freshman in musical theater, said.

Latkes can be made with plain potatoes and served with applesauce. Other ingredients also can be added to the pancakes.
Some common ingredients added to latkes include sweet potatoes, cinnamon, apple, cheese and raisins, Bell said.

Another fried food served during Hanukkah are sfganiyots, a type of fried jelly donut. The jelly donuts are a sweet contrast to the potato latkes and are popular in Jewish communities in Israel,
Bell said.

There are two types of traditional meals, a meat meal and a milk meal.

A meat meal includes beef brisket, latkes, applesauce, mushroom and barley soup, salad and a dessert-like grasshopper pie, said Phyllis Denton, member of the Congregation Olhev Shalom in Kansas City, Mo.

Denton said a milk meal could consist of tuna salad, latkes with sour cream, a noodle kugel, French onion soup, broiled stuffed tomato and a chocolate ribbon cake. A noodle kugel is made of ingredients such as noodles, eggs, apples, crushed pineapple, sour cream and cinnamon. It can be sweet or sour depending on the ingredients added to the recipe, she said.

Hanukkah gelt is another traditional Jewish food item, Bell said.

Gelt is more of a candy-like item that can be placed inside dreidels and commonly is given to children, Bell said.
The gelt is like candy money and comes in various coins.

Crispy Traditional Potato Pancakes

4 medium potatoes, peeled and coarsely shredded
1 medium onion, coarsely grated
4 green onions, chopped
1 large egg, beaten
Salt and pepper to taste
Oil for frying

In a large bowl, mix potatoes with the onion. Wrap mixture in a clean tea towel or paper towels and squeeze out all of the liquid over a measuring cup. Pour off and discard liquid, but reserve the potato starch, which will be at the bottom.

In another bowl, combine the potatoes and onion, green onions, egg, salt, pepper and potato starch.

Coat a non-stick skillet or griddle with oil. Heat over medium-heat. Press together about 2 T of potato mixture. Place in the skillet and flatten with a spatula. Repeat to make five more pancakes.

Cook about four minutes or until brown, then turn and cook another four minutes or until brown. Drain on paper towels. Cover with foil to keep warm.
Continue until all of the potato mixture is used. Makes 24 pancakes.

Cinnamon-Apple Latkes

2 eggs
3 T sugar
1 t salt
2 t cinnamon
1/2 cup water
3 cups chopped cooking apples
1/2 cup unsifted flour
1 t grated lemon peel oil
1/2 cup sugar

Beat the eggs until light and foamy.
Mix in 3 T sugar, 1 t cinnamon and water until well blended. Stir in the chopped apple, flour and grated lemon peel, mix well. Heat about 1/8-1/4 inch depth of oil in a large heavy skillet. For each latke, drop about 1/4 cup apple mixture into hot oil. Flatten slightly. Fry on each side until golden brown. Add oil to the pan as needed to keep proper depth for frying.

Drain the latkes well on absorbent paper.
Combine 1/2 cup sugar and 1 t cinnamon to make the topping. Sprinkle the sugar-cinnamon mixture over hot latkes. Serve immediately. Makes 12 latkes.

PARENTS

smaller group of children.

She said she finally settled on her current provider because Kyle seemed to feel comfortable in the home because the families shared a Christian faith. Parents shouldn't settle for anything with which they aren't really comfortable, she said.

They decided to put Alex in Head Start. Eric Sweet said the child care has let the boys become more independent, even if he didn't want them to be. Alex's language skills have improved, and he is learning his alphabet and numbers.

Jessica Sweet said Alex has picked up some interesting phrasing like, "Mommy, you're fired" and "Mommy you don't (re)spect me."

Child care was an economic necessity for the Sweets. The family needed two incomes to survive.

"It is hard knowing that it is not my choice any more. I am not able to be with them," she said. "I miss them and I worry."

The cost of child care can be an impediment to students attending school, said Nancy Bolsen, director of Adult Student Services. K-State doesn't keep any current statistics on the number of K-State students who have children.

Head Start is a free federally funded program, and the Sweets pay $75 a week for Kyle's care. Jessica Sweet said it would be difficult for the family financially if they had to pay for both boys at the same rate.

At one time Social and Rehabilitation Services, offered assistance to students for child care, but welfare reform in 1996 ended that for many students.

"It says you aren't very valuable," Bolsen said.

The focus for assistance was shifted to helping people who were undergoing short-term employment training, said Kip Lee, director of integrated services for SRS.

Students who work 20 hours a week or more might be able to get assistance for child care for the hours they work. A change in the law also might allow students in their last semester of college to receive child care assistance.

Students who take their children to the KSU Child Development Center might be eligible for a "childship" to subsidize 25 percent of their child care expenses. Student Governing Association provides $65,000 a year to the center for this purpose.

"Some students have said they would not have made it through school without the subsidy," Angela Allison, center director, said.

But even when a family can find afford quality care, other things can go wrong, Bolsen said.

Many providers won't take sick children, so parents have to stay home with the children.

Bolsen said parents should approach their professors early and ask about their attendance policies. They should let faculty know they might have to miss class when their children are sick. Most faculty are understanding, she said.

Some students have had to bring their children to class with them because of school in-service days or other problems with child care, Bolsen said. It is difficult to find short-term child care, she said. She suggested checking with a professor before doing this and being prepared to leave if the child acts up.

Sweet said he thinks the difficulties and costs of child care are a tradeoff.

"You make a sacrifice now so you can spend better time with them later," he said.

WANKLYN

semester go by more quickly, Wanklyn said.

"This semester has gone by fast because it felt like there was always something going on in Moore Hall or something to be done for a class," Wanklyn said.

Watching Wanklyn's full schedule from the sidelines, Eric Mabie, residence assistant in Moore Hall and junior in secondary education said, has seen Wanklyn change and grow throughout the semester.

"At first, I thought he was going to be one of those freshmen who I would have to pry out of his room," Mabie said, "but it did not take long to get him out of his shell and begin doing stuff because he realized he wanted to do things."

Mabie said Wanklyn's presence on the floor has become more defined and recognized because of his involvement with the Kansas State University Association of Residence Halls.

"Before he got involved in ARH there were lots of times when he would want to do something but would feel powerless," Mabie said.

"Now he sees something wrong and fixes it. He feels comfortable to speak up and show his passion in meetings and on the floor."

Mabie said Wanklyn has proven to be a good leader throughout the semester. He attributes Wanklyn's success to his leadership style.

"It is part of the way he communicates and works with others," Mabie said. "He uses this light hearted approach that doesn't come across authoritarian and because of his approach others can see his ideas without seeing them as a threat."

Wanklyn's father, Mark Wanklyn, a farmer in Lakin, Kan., said he was not taken aback with his son's successes or level of involvement this semester.

"I was not surprised when I heard how busy he got," Mark Wanklyn said. "He was just as busy while in high school."

Not surprised by his son's achievements, Wanklyn's father said he is proud of his son's ability to make the transition from high school to college so easily.

A bit worn out after his first full semester, Wanklyn said he is proud of himself because he feels he has accomplished his primary goal of the semester — making it through.

"I am just so glad I have made it through my first semester," Wanklyn said. "That was my main goal, to get accustomed to college life and to do my best."

Wanklyn said although he has been through a lot this semester, he said he doesn't feel like he has changed much.

"Of course I have changed, but I am still the same Craig everyone knows," he said. "I have changed because I have been exposed to more things and learned more about life. If you would ask my friends in Lakin, they would think I was the same old Craig."

What is in store for Wanklyn over the next nine semesters?
